Solicitors: Pyke, Middleton & Brown (for the petitioner); Treasury Solicitor.

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re SIMPSON'S MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.
CHADDERTON AND OTHERS v. SIMPSON AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 20, 1952.]

A Power of Appointment—Fraudulent exercise—Exercise to further some purpose other than benefit of object—Special power of appointment among children and remoter issue—Power, contained in appointor's marriage settlement, exercised by will in favour of appointor's surviving children—Condition directing forfeiture of appointee's share of appointor's residuary trust funds unless appointee's share under settlement settled as directed.

B An appointment will be held to be fraudulent if it is exercised with a view to furthering some purpose which the appointor had in view other than the sole purpose of benefiting the object of the power.

C By a settlement made on his marriage, and dated Apr. 9, 1902, the testator was given a power to appoint the trust funds in favour of the children or remoter issue of the marriage, and, in default of appointment, the funds were to be held on trust for all the children of the marriage as should attain the age of twenty-one years in equal shares. There were four children of the marriage, each of whom attained the age of twenty-one, but one of whom died in 1927. By his will, made on Mar. 29, 1950, the testator, who died on Sept. 27, 1950, directed his trustees to hold his residuary trust funds on trust for such of his children as should be living at his death in equal shares, and then settled the share of each child. He then purported to exercise the power of appointment contained in the marriage settlement by directing the trustees of the settlement to hold the trust funds on trust for such of his three surviving children as should be living at his death, if more than one, in equal shares. He then went on to say, in the same clause of the will: "Provided always and I declare that no child of mine who shall survive me shall be entitled to a share of the residuary trust funds or any income thereof unless such child shall . . . assign to or otherwise vest in my trustees the share of such child under the . . . settlement . . . to be held by my trustees upon the same trusts in every respect . . . as the share of such child in the residuary trust funds under this my will and in case any child of mine shall after the expiration of such time as my trustees shall determine refuse or neglect to assign to or otherwise vest in my trustees his or her share under the . . . settlement then the residuary trust fund shall be held on such trusts as would be applicable under this my will if my child so refusing or neglecting as aforesaid had died in my lifetime a bachelor or a spinster".

F G H HELD: (i) the power of appointment under the marriage settlement was exercised by the testator, not solely with the object of benefiting the appointees, but for the purpose of carrying out his own project, viz., to have the marriage settlement funds dealt with as if they were his own property, and, therefore, the appointment was not clean of the taint of equitable fraud and was void, and the trust funds were now held on trust for the three surviving children and the personal representative of the deceased child in equal fourth shares under the trusts in default of appointment contained in the settlement.

(ii) "the share of such child under the . . . settlement" in the proviso to the clause whereby the testator purported to exercise the power of appointment was a proper description of the share which the child took in default of appointment, and, on the true construction of the will, the condition requiring each of the three surviving children to settle, as mentioned in the will, his or her share under the settlement was valid and binding and affected the share which each child took in default of appointment.

(iii) in the event of all of the three surviving children refusing to comply with the condition, the testator's residuary trust funds would be held on trust for the persons entitled thereto under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, Part IV, on the footing that the testator died intestate in respect thereof.

AS TO FRAUDULENT APPOINTMENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 581-585, paras. 1033-1035; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 37, pp. 502-504, Nos. 961-971, and p. 513, Nos. 1046-1052. A

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Neave, [1938] 3 All E.R. 220; [1938] Ch. 793; 107 L.J.Ch. 395; 159 L.T. 210; Digest Supp.
- (2) King v. King, (1864), 15 L.Ch.R. 479; 20 Digest 429, 1590i.
- (3) Re Marsden's Trust, (1859), 4 Drew. 594; 28 L.J.Ch. 906; 33 L.T.O.S. 217; 62 E.R. 228; 37 Digest 513, 1048. B
- (4) Pryor v. Pryor, (1864), 2 De G.J. & Sm. 205; 33 L.J.Ch. 441; 10 L.T. 360; 46 E.R. 353; 37 Digest 511, 1031.
- (5) Vatcher v. Paull, [1915] A.C. 372; 84 L.J.P.C. 86; 112 L.T. 737; 37 Digest 492, 865.
- (6) Re Crawshay, [1947] 1 All E.R. 643; [1947] Ch. 356; affd. C.A. [1948] 1 All E.R. 107; [1948] Ch. 123; [1948] L.J.R. 586; 2nd Digest Supp. C
- (7) Sweetapple v. Horlock, (1879), 11 Ch.D. 745; 48 L.J.Ch. 660; 41 L.T. 272; 37 Digest 478, 758.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS, in the Liverpool District Registry, to determine inter alia (a) whether the exercise by the testator's will of a power of appointment contained in his marriage settlement was valid or was void as being a fraud on the power by reason of a condition, attached to the appointment, that the appointees, three surviving children of the marriage on whom the testator had settled his residuary trust funds, were to settle, in like manner, the share which each child took under the settlement; (b) whether the condition, under which a child was to forfeit his share of the testator's residuary trust funds if he failed to settle his share under the settlement, was valid and binding on the children; and (c) if the condition was held to be binding and all the children refused to comply with it, the destination of the testator's residuary trust funds. D E. W. Griffith for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the will.

E. B. Stamp for the first and third defendants, children of the marriage.

J. F. Bowyer for the second defendant, a child of the marriage. E

Joseph Turner for the fourth defendant, the legal personal representative of a deceased child of the marriage. F

Hunter-Brown for the fifth and sixth defendants, infant children of the second defendant.

Arthur Bagnall for the seventh and eighth defendants, infant children of the third defendant. G

P. I. Bell for the ninth defendant, the sole trustee of the testator's marriage settlement.

VAISEY, J.: This summons raises certain questions of construction and of law. The main question which I have to decide is whether the will of Stephen Simpson, deceased, discloses, on the face of it, that an appointment, which the testator purported to exercise by the will, and which was made under the trusts of his marriage settlement, is invalid as being a fraud on the power of appointment. H

The settlement, which was made in consideration of the marriage of Nathalie Hesketh and the testator, was dated Apr. 9, 1902, and was made between Nathalie Hesketh, of the first part, the testator, of the second part, and certain trustees, of the third part. The relevant trusts were to pay the income to the wife, i.e., Nathalie Hesketh, during her life, and on her death to pay the income to the husband, i.e., the testator. The wife died on Aug. 9, 1921. The testator died on Sept. 27, 1950, having made a will on Mar. 29, 1950, which was duly admitted to probate. That will exercised, or purported to exercise, the power of appointment which was contained in the marriage settlement, and which was made in common form in favour of the issue of the marriage. The trusts of the settlement were that, after the death of the survivor of the husband and wife, the trustees were directed to stand possessed of the trust fund and the income thereof

" . . . in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of the said intended marriage at such age or time . . . ", and so forth, as the husband and wife should jointly appoint, and, subject to any such appointment, as the survivor might appoint. There was no exercise of the power except the exercise, if it were an exercise, by the will of the testator. There were issue of the marriage four children, of whom a son, Stephen Hesketh Simpson, and two daughters, Melene Irving Barnes and Christine Valerie Stuart (each of whom has attained the age of twenty-one years), are defendants to this summons. Another daughter, Mrs. O'Sullivan, died [without issue] on Dec. 23, 1927, having attained the age of twenty-one years and having married. Her husband and legal personal representative is before the court as a defendant.

The testator's will begins by appointing executors, and making a certain number of dispositions. The testator then gave his residuary estate to trustees on the usual trusts for conversion, the payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts and legacies, and the investment of the balance as residuary trust funds. He then directed his trustees [in cl. 6] to hold the residuary trust funds in trust for such of his children as should be living at his death, and, if more than one, in equal shares. There were three children living at his death, and, therefore, down to that point, there was a clear trust for the three children in equal shares. By cl. 7 (a) of the will the testator declared that if more than one, in equal shares. By an accruer clause at the end of cl. 7 (a), in case the trusts declared concerning any share of the residuary trust funds should fail or determine, there was a gift over to the other shares of the residuary trust funds. The direction [contained in cl. 7 (b)] with respect to the share of the son is, putting it shortly, in the nature of a protected life interest with discretionary powers as to the application of the income subjoined to it.

" . . . my trustees shall retain the share of each of my children who shall survive me in the residuary trust funds upon the following trusts (that is to say) upon trust to pay the income thereof to each such child as to my son as provided in the next clause and as to each of my daughters for her life and after the death of each child in trust for the child or children or remoter issue of such child or any of them at such ages or times not being earlier than the age of twenty-one years or day of marriage in such shares (if more than one) and in such manner as such child shall by will or codicil appoint and in default of and subject to such appointment in trust for all the children of my same child who being male attain the age of twenty-one years or being female attain that age or marry . . . "

Having dealt with his own estate in that manner, the testator proceeded to exercise the power of appointment given to him by the settlement. By cl. 8 of the will he directed the trustees of the settlement to hold the trust funds on trust for such of them, the son and the two surviving daughters, as should be living at his death, and, if more than one, in equal shares, and he continued:

" Provided always and I declare that no child of mine who shall survive me shall be entitled to a share of the residuary trust funds or any income thereof unless such child shall as soon as conveniently may be at the expense of my trust estate assign to or otherwise vest in my trustees the share of such child under the said settlement dated Apr. 9, 1902, to be held by my trustees upon the same trusts in every respect (including the gift over) as the share of such child in the residuary trust funds under this my will and in case any child of mine shall after the expiration of such time as my trustees shall determine refuse or neglect to assign to or otherwise vest in my trustees his or her share under the said settlement then the residuary trust fund shall be held on such trusts as would be applicable under this my will if my child so refusing or neglecting as aforesaid had died in my lifetime a bachelor or a spinster."

The value of the testator's residuary trust funds is said to be approximately £34,000. The value of the property subject to the trusts of the marriage settlement is £4,000 or thereabouts. The three children, the son and the two surviving daughters, have informed the executors "... that they do not consider the condition attached by the will of the testator to his appointment to them respectively of the property subject to the trusts of the settlement to be binding upon them, and that, if it should be held to be an effective condition, they would propose to refuse to comply therewith if the result of such refusal would be to cause the testator to die intestate in respect of his residuary trust funds."

That being the position, this summons was issued. The first question that I am asked to decide is whether the property subject to the trusts of the settlement is now held (a) on trust for the son and surviving daughters

"... in equal third shares absolutely by virtue of the appointment contained in the will of the testator; or (b) upon trust for the three defendants and [the personal representative of the deceased daughter] in equal quarter shares by virtue of the trusts in default of appointment contained in the said settlement upon the footing that the appointment thereof contained in the will of the testator is ineffective..."

That alternative submission is based on the proposition that, on the face of it, the will, in purporting to exercise the power of appointment, was fraudulent in the technical sense and inoperative, with the result that the fund remains unappointed and so passes in equal fourth shares to the three surviving children and the representative of the fourth child, and not under the appointment to the surviving three.

I do not think that this is an easy question, and there are, I think, only two authorities, Re Neave (1), a decision of FARWELL, J., and King v. King (2), an Irish decision, which appear to support the proposition that this kind of scheme is operative by quasi application of the principle of election or otherwise. In Re Neave (1) FARWELL, J., held that the conditions sought to be proposed by the proviso in the will which was before him were ineffective and invalid, and that the appointees took under the appointment free from the conditions which were designed to bring about the settlement of the appointed share. In his judgment, FARWELL, J., said ([1938] 3 All E.R. 224):

"... [the testator] has sought to impose a condition upon the two sons in connection with their enjoyment of the property which they take under the power. He has endeavoured to impose upon them a condition that they shall settle that property in such a way that, if it had been contained in the appointment itself, it would obviously have been void on one ground, at any rate—namely, that it exceeded the power. In my judgment, a testator cannot so exercise his power as to impose a condition as to the enjoyment of the property which he is appointing in such a way that the appointment would have an illegal effect. However, a testator may, of course, say: 'I exercise the special power of appointment in favour of the objects of the power, and I give the residue of my property, some other portion of my property, to those objects, but, if those objects do not make a settlement of the property which they get under the appointment, then they shall forfeit what I otherwise would have given them out of my own property.' That is a perfectly legal thing, and one which any testator is entitled to do. It is said in this case that, on the true construction of this will, that is really what the testator has done."

But FARWELL, J., decided that that was not the effect of the will in that case.

- A It seems to me that that dictum of FARWELL, J., really covers the present case. In King v. King (2), which was decided by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland (MAZIERE BRADY) in 1864, it was held (and not merely stated by way of dictum), that, because of the express clause in the will then before the court, the legatees could not take the legacies which were given to them by the will without settling their shares in the appointed fund according to the direction of the testatrix.
- B Those two cases, one by its decision and the other by its dictum, are undoubtedly in favour of the view that the testator's appointment was valid and was not vitiated by any taint of fraud. On the other side, there is a great mass of authority as to what is or is not a fraud within the meaning of that expression as used in connection with frauds on the power. Neither Re Marsden's Trust (3) nor Pryor v. Pryor (4) is really similar to the present case, because in each of
- C these cases there was something in the nature of an understanding, which raises entirely different questions from those which I have to decide in the present case. There is no question of bargain here, so far as I know. The testator had not approached the children to induce them to do anything with their shares after his death, and the whole matter turns on what appears in the will itself.

- D In my opinion, the law on the subject is best to be found in Vatcher v. Paull (5), where there is a very clear enunciation of the principle by LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council. Then I might also refer, not because of anything which it decides, but because the authorities are there summed up, to my own decision in Re Crawshay (6), which was approved in the Court of Appeal, where, again, the authorities were exhaustively considered in the judgment of the court delivered by COHEN, L.J., on the second question
- E for determination. The doctrine of fraud on a power has received a good deal of illumination in recent times, and I think that, as compared with 1864, there is a much greater emphasis laid on that principle today. The doctrine can be summed up in the shortest possible way by saying that an appointment will be held to be fraudulent if it is exercised with a view to furthering some purpose which the appointor had in view other than the sole purpose of benefiting the
- F appointee who is or may be the object of the power. In Re Crawshay (6) what the appointor had in view was to bring in some children who had been excluded from taking any benefit under her father's will whereby the power was created. The appointment was made to a relative whom the appointor had good reason to suppose would remedy what was regarded as a grave injustice. In the present case, it seems to me that the exercise of the power under the marriage settlement
- G was made for the purpose of furthering an object which the testator had in view, which was not confined to the benefits simpliciter of the appointees themselves. I think he was determined that, so far as he could, he would tie up the property with his own property and have it dealt with as if it were his own property. In my view, according to the modern trend of authorities, as exemplified in Vatcher v. Paull (5), and as explained by reference to the earlier authorities in
- H my own judgment and in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Re Crawshay (6), that kind of intention on the part of the appointor vitiates the appointment because he was doing something to serve his own ends, to carry out his own projects, to give effect to his own ideas of what was right and proper, and not merely to further the benefit of the appointees themselves, without any regard to those issues. Therefore, I think, on the whole, that the appointment of the marriage settlement fund by the will of the testator was void, as it was not clean of that taint of equitable fraud which, according to well settled principles, destroys the efficacy of the exercise of the power. I feel bound to hold, though not without some hesitation, that, as the appointment was invalid, the trust funds are now held on trust for the three surviving children and the personal representative of the deceased child in equal fourth shares, not under the appointment, but by virtue of the trusts in default of appointment which are contained in the settlement. That is the declaration I shall make on the first question raised by the summons.

The second question which is raised is:

"Whether the condition contained in the will of the testator requiring [the three surviving children] to settle as therein mentioned the share appointed to him or her of the property subject to the trusts of the above mentioned settlement is (a) valid and binding upon them respectively; or (b) void and ineffective."

No share, as I have already held, has been appointed to them, but when I look at the words of the will a curious difficulty appears to me to arise. In cl. 8 the testator says:

"In exercise of the power conferred upon me by the settlement . . . I appoint and direct that the trustees of the said settlement shall hold the trust funds comprised therein upon trust for such of [the three surviving children] as shall be living at my death and if more than one in equal shares . . ."

I have already held that that is inoperative, but he goes on:

"Provided always and I declare that no child of mine who shall survive me shall be entitled to a share of the residuary trust funds or any income thereof unless such child shall as soon as conveniently may be at the expense of my trust estate assign to or otherwise vest in my trustees the share of such child under the said settlement . . . to be held by my trustees upon the same trusts . . ."

as the share of the child in the residuary trust funds. The question is whether "the share of such child under the said settlement" refers exclusively to the share which the testator must have supposed that he had appointed under the early part of the clause or whether it extends to the share of such child under the settlement in default of appointment. It is not, perhaps, immaterial to observe that there is a very remarkable principle that, where an appointment is made, the appointed share is held not under the settlement which creates the power, but under the deed of appointment. That has sometimes arisen in this way. Where an assignment is made of the assignor's share under a settlement, it has been held that the assignment does not apply to, or affect, the share which the assignor subsequently acquires under a deed of appointment. There is a distinction drawn between a share which is taken under the original document in default of appointment and the share which is taken by the appointee under the appointment itself. In Sweetapple v. Horlock (7), which is usually cited in this connection, it was held, in effect, that the appointees took new estates under the appointment and did not take any estate directly under the settlement itself in default of appointment.

I find this a difficult problem to decide. Strictly speaking, "the share of [a] child under the . . . settlement" is a proper description of the share under the settlement in default of appointment and is not—although I think it is apt to cover it—really an absolutely correct description of the share taken under the appointment itself. If the clause to which I am now referring had been introduced merely by the words "Provided always", I think that there would have been a great deal to be said in favour of it being merely a proviso applicable to the appointed share. As there is, in the events which happened, no appointed share, I think it would have followed necessarily that nothing in the proviso would have had any effect. But the testator does not say merely: "Provided always that no child shall be entitled to a share of the residuary trust funds". He says: "I declare that no child . . . shall be entitled to a share of the residuary trust funds". On the whole, in my judgment, the direction to bring into settlement the share which the child took in default of appointment is affected by and caught by this proviso. Therefore, I shall declare, in answer to the second question raised in the summons, that the condition requiring the testator's three surviving children to settle as therein mentioned, not the share appointed to him or her of the property subject to the trusts of the settlement, but the share which such child took under the settlement, is valid and binding on them and affects the share which each child took in default of appointment.

Lastly, I have to decide this question. Assuming that the condition is held to be binding on the three surviving children and that all of them will refuse to comply with the condition, what would happen to the residuary trust funds? That depends on the concluding words of cl. 8, which are as follows:

" . . . and in case any child of mine shall after the expiration of such time as my trustees shall determine refuse or neglect to assign to or otherwise vest in my trustees his or her share under the said settlement then the residuary trust fund shall be held on such trusts as would be applicable under this my will if my child so refusing or neglecting as aforesaid had died in my lifetime a bachelor or a spinster."

It is suggested, on the one hand, that that means that the residuary trust funds will go as on an intestacy, in the events which have happened, in equal shares between the three surviving children, or, in the alternative, that it is a direction for the distribution of the estate on the footing that all three children have died in the testator's lifetime without ever having been married. In my view, the first of those alternatives is the correct one. I think the question raised in question 3 of the summons should be answered by declaring that, if all the three children refuse to comply with the condition, the residuary trust funds of the testator "will be held upon trust for the persons entitled thereto" under the relevant provisions of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, Part IV.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Wilson, Wright & Ascrofts, Preston (for the plaintiffs and the second, fourth, fifth and sixth defendants); Warren & Warren (for the first, third, seventh and eighth defendants); Winder & Holden, Bolton (for the ninth defendant).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

TRANS TRUST S.P.R.L. v. DANUBIAN TRADING CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), March 10, 11, 12, 28, 1952.]

Damages—Measure of damages—Foreseeable consequences of breach of contract—Sale of goods—Loss of profit—Payment by confirmed letter of credit—Failure to procure confirmation—Knowledge of parties that subject-matter of sale unobtainable by sellers without confirmation.

On Sept. 10, 1950, a Belgian company offered to A. Co. one thousand tons of rolled steel, f.o.b. Antwerp, delivery in December, payment to be against an irrevocable and confirmed letter of credit. A. Co., who were unable to produce the letter of credit themselves, offered the steel to the sellers who in turn offered it to the buyers. On Sept. 20, 1950, the buyers, subject to the requirements as to the provision of a letter of credit, offered the steel to an American company. Both the sellers and the buyers knew that neither of them was in a position to fulfil their contractual obligations unless the American company made the money available through a letter of credit. On Sept. 25 the American company accepted the buyers' offer, and on the same day the buyers agreed with the sellers that they would purchase the steel, stating: "A credit will be opened forthwith". Thereupon the sellers gave a written order to A. Co. The American company failed to open the credit, and, the buyers being unable to do so, the sellers claimed against the buyers for breach of contract and a declaration that the sellers were entitled to be indemnified against any damages payable by them to A. Co. At all material times the market value of the steel was higher than the contract price. On the question of damages, HELD: the buyers being aware that the sellers could not obtain the goods unless the letter of credit was provided, the sellers were entitled to damages representing the loss of the profit which they would have made on a sale to the buyers, that being a loss which at the time of the contract was foreseeable by the buyers as the probable consequences of their breach, but the buyers were not aware that A. Co. also depended on the credit to obtain the goods, and, therefore, a loss by that company and possible right of recovery against the sellers was not within the contemplation of the parties, but was too remote, and the sellers were not entitled to the declaration sought.

Decision of McNAIR, J. (ante, p. 89), reversed in part.

AS TO REMOTENESS OF DAMAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 103-109, paras. 130-136; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 17, pp. 95-99, Nos. 108-141.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Hadley v. Baxendale, (1854), 9 Exch. 341; 23 L.J.Ex. 179; 23 L.T.O.S. 69; 8 Digest 138, 910.
- (2) Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 997; [1949] 2 K.B. 528; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Monarch S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A. B.), [1949] 1 All E.R. 1; [1949] A.C. 196; [1949] L.J.R. 772; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Wallis v. Smith, (1882), 21 Ch.D. 243; 52 L.J.Ch. 145; 47 L.T. 389; 17 Digest 79, 12.
- (5) Liesbosch, Dredger v. Edison S.S., [1933] A.C. 449; 102 L.J.P. 73; sub nom. The Edison, 149 L.T. 49; Digest Supp.
- (6) Muhammad Issa el Sheikh Ahmad v. Ali, [1947] A.C. 414; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Household Machines, Ltd. v. Cosmos Exporters, Ltd., [1946] 2 All E.R. 622; [1947] K.B. 217; [1947] L.J.R. 578; 176 L.T. 49; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (8) Pavia & Co., S.P.A. v. Thurmann-Nielsen, [1952] 1 All E.R. 492.

(9) London, Chatham & Dover Ry. Co. v. South Eastern Ry. Co., [1893] A.C. 429; 63 L.J.Ch. 93; 69 L.T. 637; 58 J.P. 36; 17 Digest 239, 555.

APPEAL by the buyers from an order of McNAIR, J., dated Dec. 13, 1951, and reported ante, p. 89.

The sellers claimed that in September, 1950, by a contract partly verbal and partly in writing they agreed to sell to the buyers, who agreed to buy from them, A one thousand tons of rolled steel sheets from S. A. Metallurgique d'Esperance Londoze (the manufacturers), price 8,025 Belgian francs per one thousand kilos, f.o.b. Antwerp, delivery in December, 1950. Payment was to be cash against shipping documents from a confirmed letter of credit to be opened by an American company to whom the buyers had re-sold or were proposing to re-sell the goods, such credit to be provided at the Krediet Bank in Brussels in favour B of S.A. Azur from whom the sellers were buying the goods. The sellers alleged that it was a term of the contract that the buyers would cause the letter of credit to be opened and confirmed forthwith; that no such letter of credit was opened, and that by a letter dated Oct. 16, 1950, the buyers refused to take any steps to have the same opened; and that thereby the buyers had broken their contract and the sellers had suffered damage. The buyers alleged that the contract was C conditional on a letter of credit being provided by the American buyers, and that, if no such letter was provided, no obligation was to be assumed by the buyers. McNAIR, J., found that there had been a binding agreement between the parties, that a term of that agreement was that the buyers would see that a credit was opened forthwith and that the buyers were in breach of that agreement, and he awarded the sellers £3,214 5s. 8d., damages, being the loss of profit suffered by D the sellers based on the difference between the price at which the sellers had agreed to buy from S.A. Azur and the price which they would have received had the contract been performed. The learned judge also granted the sellers a declaration that they were entitled to be indemnified by the buyers to the extent that the sellers might be held liable to S.A. Azur for the sellers' breach of contract with that company.

E Winn for the buyers.
Mocatta, Q.C., and T. G. Roche for the sellers.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 28. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: In this case the sellers claimed and were held entitled F by McNAIR, J., to damages for breach of contract and a declaration covering prospective further damage. The buyers appeal.

On Sept. 1, 1950, steel manufacturers in Belgium offered to a Belgian company, Fabema, one thousand tons of rolled steel in approximately equal quantities of three gauges, separate prices for each gauge, the mean price being 7,085 Belgian francs per ton, f.o.b. Antwerp, delivery in December. According to what was G a normal requirement in contracts of this kind in Belgium at the time, payment was to be against an irrevocable credit to be opened at the same time as the order. That offer was accepted on Sept. 9. Fabema offered the steel to a company, Azur, and after some negotiations Azur were given an option up to the end of September. Azur notified the sellers, also a Belgian company, who notified the buyers. The prices quoted increased as the offer passed down the H chain. The individuals concerned were, on behalf of the sellers, Mr. Wilhelm, and, on the part of the buyers, Mr. Schindler. The agreement sued on was alleged by the sellers to have been made orally in telephone conversations between Sept. 21 and 25 and at an interview in Brussels on Sept. 26, 1950, confirmed by a written order sent by the buyers on Oct. 2. Neither the sellers nor the buyers had the financial resources to obtain the credit which was known to be required forthwith. The buyers, through Mr. Schindler, after he had been notified of the offer, got in touch on Sept. 20 with a Mr. Trup, who was vice-president of the Leland Corporation of Illinois, who happened to be in London. Mr. Schindler made clear to Mr. Trup the necessity for the immediate opening of the credit. The learned judge found that Mr. Trup informed Mr. Schindler of his acceptance on behalf of the Leland Corporation on Sept. 24, and the buyers received a written order from the Leland Corporation on Sept. 25. On that day the buyers wrote a letter which I will read with an order, the material parts of which I will also read.

"To Messrs. Trans Trust Ltd., Brussels. Dear Sirs, we beg to hand you herewith our order No. 257 for one thousand tons hot rolled sheets as per your offer of Sept. 19. This order has been given to us on an official form of the Leland Corporation of Chicago, Ill., by their vice-president who is here in London. A credit will be opened forthwith, but we have been asked to send as soon as possible one sheet as a sample as they want to make trials with that quality. Yours faithfully, for and on behalf of Danubian Trading Co. Ltd."

Then the order gives the quantity and the price of the goods, giving only one gauge. The price is 8,025 francs, and then there is the analysis, the description of the sheets and packing, and then

"Terms: Cash against documents from confirmed letter of credit. Special Instructions: As the letter of credit will be opened in dollars at the rate of 7.55 per 100 lb. which is our selling price, we must have a confirmation from you that the difference between the purchase price and the aforementioned price will be placed immediately at our disposal. For and on behalf of Danubian Trading Co. Ltd."

The letter makes it clear that the buyers realised that the credit had to be opened forthwith, and indicates that that had been accepted by the Leland Corporation. There is admittedly a variation between the order and the offer as passed on to the buyers. The offer was for three gauges, 18, 20, and 22. The order is for one gauge only, 20. Time was running out and it is clear that Mr. Wilhelm, who knew of Mr. Schindler's negotiations with Mr. Trup, had been expecting or hoping for notifications of the credit with the order. He telephoned on Sept. 25 and was told by Mr. Schindler that the credit was on its way. He telephoned again on Sept. 26 and Mr. Schindler accelerated a visit to Brussels where he arrived later on Sept. 26. At this stage, Mr. Wilhelm had not received the buyers' letter and order. It was obtained during the interview which was at the office of Fabema whose representative was Mr. Cannio. When the documents arrived Mr. Wilhelm noticed the variation in the gauges. There was some conflict of evidence as to this on which the learned judge accepted, as on other matters, the evidence of Mr. Wilhelm. I do not think it affects the issue, but it is clear that Mr. Schindler agreed he would put the matter right with Mr. Trup and took back the order. There was also discussion as to date of shipment and whether the steel would be ready before January. After the interview, or possibly on Sept. 27, Mr. Schindler informed Mr. Wilhelm that Mr. Trup agreed to the three gauges.

I will now read the learned judge's finding. It was not disputed that the judge's references to Mr. Wilhelm and Mr. Schindler are to be treated as meaning sellers and buyers. In all the conversations they were, of course, acting on behalf of their companies.

"The result of all that is that I am satisfied that at latest by the 27th a firm agreement was made between Mr. Schindler and Mr. Wilhelm, that Mr. Schindler's firm should purchase the one thousand tons of steel as specified, in three gauges in approximately equal quantities, at a mean price of 8,025 Belgian francs, and that it was part of that agreement that Mr. Schindler undertook a personal obligation to procure that the Leland Corporation would make available forthwith a letter of credit in favour of Messrs. Azur, the sellers to the plaintiffs, and that Mr. Wilhelm would account to Mr. Schindler for the difference between 7.55 U.S. dollars a ton and 8,025 Belgian francs, and I am also satisfied that by that date it had been agreed between the parties that no objection would be taken to January delivery, if necessary."

Subject to the submission of counsel for the buyers that this was a contract solely in writing which cannot be varied or contradicted by oral evidence, this is, of course, a finding of fact. The learned judge accepted Mr. Wilhelm as an honest and accurate witness, and the evidence clearly supports the finding. Mr. Schindler's main case, which he sought unsuccessfully to support by evidence, was that any agreement between the parties was either subject to the opening of the credit by Leland or was dissolved if, as happened, the credit was not opened, or, put as counsel for the buyers sought to put it, the buyers did not undertake that the credit would be opened forthwith. They made an innocent misrepresentation with regard to it which induced the contract, but it was not a term of the contract. This might give a right to rescission, but under the contract, on this view, the credit did not have to be opened until or shortly before the shipment period. Reliance was placed on the absence in the "order" as distinct from the letter of any reference to the immediate opening of the credit. Whether either of these was the basis of the relationship, assuming the contract to be oral, depends on what was said. We could not possibly interfere with the learned judge's finding unless, perhaps, it could be shown that there were statements in the letters which showed it was wrong. I do not propose to refer in detail to the letters. I agree with the learned judge that on the whole they are more consistent with the agreement as found by him than with the buyers' case. I will complete the narrative before coming to the submissions of counsel for the buyers. A renewal of the option was obtained by Azur ultimately, in effect, till Oct. 17, and on Oct. 1 the sellers put their order, previously given and accepted orally, in writing to Azur. On Oct. 2 the buyers sent their order corrected as to gauges. In the covering letter the buyers refer to the "fact that the credit has not been opened as it should have been." They refer to protests they had made and assurances they had received from Mr. Trup. On the same day the buyers wrote to Mr. Trup. There were further communications. On Oct. 14, a Saturday, the sellers cabled to the buyers giving Oct. 17, Tuesday, as the latest day by which the credit must be opened. This was confirmed by a letter. The credit was not opened. The sellers claimed against the buyers for breach of contract, and on the contract as found by the learned judge there clearly was a breach.

The first point of counsel for the buyers before us was that the learned judge was wrong in law in admitting oral evidence to contradict or vary a written agreement. There are letters prior to Sept. 26 referring to telephone conversations and the offer which make it quite clear that the parties were not ad idem up to and including Sept. 25. It was on that day that the buyers wrote out and sent the order and covering letter which I have read. This was for one thousand tons of gauge 20, whereas the sellers' offer was in respect of three gauges. Regarded as a counter offer it was not accepted, nor as a document was it amended till Oct. 2. No point is taken in this case as to unenforceability under s. 4 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. There is no document signed by the sellers said to constitute the agreement. There would have, therefore, to be oral evidence to show that the sellers had accepted some document as embodying the terms of the contract. The evidence as to the interview of Sept. 26 as accepted by the learned judge seems to me to negative any such conclusion. The letter and order arrived in the course of the interview. Mr. Wilhelm noticed that there was only one gauge, and this was of vital importance as the Leland Corporation order had to correspond with the steel to be supplied by the mill. Apart from that, as it seems to me, the learned judge came to the right conclusion, namely, that the parties were orally agreeing the contractual position as between themselves and were not embodying them in a document. It was common ground that the credit had to be opened before the option expired. The learned judge has found that as between sellers and buyers, Mr. Schindler agreed to the possibility of January shipment. When Mr. Schindler obtained, as he did on Sept. 26 or 27, while still in Brussels, Mr. Trup's agreement to the three gauges, no amendment was then made to the written order. If the credit had been opened by Leland before Oct. 2 when the buyers amended the order and the sellers had sought to say that the parties were not ad idem because the written order of Sept. 25 was for one gauge only, they would have been in a hopeless position because Mr. Schindler had orally agreed to accept the offer as originally made, namely, for three gauges. This seems to me to show clearly that the parties were proceeding on the basis of the spoken and not the written word. This point, therefore, in my opinion, fails.

Before the learned judge and before us a further point was taken, namely, that the sellers' cable of Oct. 14 received by the buyers on Oct. 16, giving Oct. 17 as the last day on which the credit should be opened, was a breach of contract by the sellers. This was based on the principle that a party who allows time for an act to be extended must give reasonable notice as to the time when he will regard failure to fulfil the conditions as a breach. In the circumstances of this case, and having regard to modern facilities for rapid communication, I agree with the learned judge that this was not inadequate notice. I also agree with him that the buyers' letter of Oct. 16, in which they indicated that they were going to take no further steps to obtain the letter of credit makes it impossible for them to rely on this point.

With regard to the measure of damages, the sellers claimed, and the learned judge awarded them, a sum equal to the profit which they would have made if the credit had been opened and the successive sales had gone through. This was £3,214 5s. 8d. It was not disputed before us that at the date of the breach the market price of steel was higher than the contract price. I agree, of course, with counsel for the buyers that, prima facie, in these circumstances, on a repudiation by the buyer, the seller can claim nominal damages only. The two rules in Hadley v. Baxendale (1) were recently considered by this court and their operation was analysed by ASQUITH, L.J., in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (2) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1002). There is also, if I may say so, a helpful sentence which I will cite from LORD WRIGHT's speech ([1949] 1 All E.R. 14) in Monarch S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A.B.) (3):

"These general statements could be multiplied, but the question in a case like the present must always be what reasonable business men must be taken to have contemplated as the natural or probable result if the contract was broken."

The learned judge found, and on this point the evidence wholly supports his finding, that sellers and buyers knew that neither of them was in a position to open the necessary credit. Their role was that of intermediaries making a profit if the buyers had been able to perform their undertaking to procure the opening forthwith by the Leland Corporation of the necessary credit. This, then, was, it is said, the contemplated loss if the buyers failed to carry out their undertaking. The learned judge summarises the issue in this way (ante, p. 90):

"It was established that at all material times the market value of the steel, in the hands of anyone in a financial position to obtain it from the suppliers, was in excess of the contract price as between the sellers and the buyers, but it was also established that both the sellers and the buyers knew that neither of them was in a position to put up the necessary Belgian francs to satisfy their purchase obligations unless the American buyers made the money available through their letter of credit. Accordingly, it would be within the reasonable contemplation of both of them that failure to put up the letter of credit would mean that the contract could not be executed."

In the present case the seller would get only nominal damages if the prima facie measure as laid down in s. 50 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, was applicable. He gets more than the prima facie measure. One can imagine cases in which the principle as applied by the learned judge would give him less. If the market price had fallen so that the prima facie measure gave a larger sum than the loss of profit, the seller might find himself restricted to his loss of profit on the deal if that was the loss contemplated in the circumstances by the parties.

The first submission of counsel for the buyers was that the buyers' breach was a failure to pay money and that the only damage recoverable in such a case is interest: Wallis v. Smith (4). The learned judge regarded the principle as inapplicable to a failure to procure the provision of a letter of credit. There is, I think, a further difficulty. If on a sale of goods the buyer fails to open a credit or to provide the purchase price, and this can be, and is, accepted as a repudiation of the contract, the principle clearly has no application. The seller is entitled, not merely to interest, but to damages to be assessed according to the prima facie measure or having regard to the special circumstances, if any. This seems to show that the principle relied on by counsel for the buyers is inapplicable in the present case even if one treats the failure to open the credit as a failure to pay money. Counsel further submitted that the loss here was due to the sellers' impecuniosity and that such loss is in law too remote. We were referred to Liesbosch, Dredger v. Edison S.S. (5), and Muhammad Issa el Sheikh Ahmad v. Ali (6). The result is stated by LORD WRIGHT ([1949] 1 All E.R. 14) in Monarch S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A.B.) (3), namely, that damages due to impecuniosity may not be too remote if the loss might reasonably be expected to be in the contemplation of the parties. The learned judge stated his conclusion as follows (ante, p. 91):

"Here I have reached the conclusion, on the facts of this case, that the loss of profit claimed by the sellers is not too remote although consequent on the sellers' impecuniosity because the loss was such as might reasonably be expected to be in the contemplation of the parties as likely to flow from the breach of the obligation undertaken by the buyers."

I agree with the conclusion and have only one comment to make on it. The real question is what was the loss contemplated by the parties rather than the reason for it. Even if the sellers had been very rich, it might still have been "contemplated" that, if the buyers did not procure the obtaining of the credit, the sellers could not and would not themselves have used their resources for the opening of a credit for this steel.

The learned judge, as I have said, ordered a declaration that the sellers were entitled to recover from the buyers such damages as in law may be due from them to Azur and which they may be adjudged liable to pay. The question whether this damage was too remote was, I think, argued more fully before us than before the learned judge. The buyers, undoubtedly, knew that Azur were sellers to the sellers. The credit was to be opened in their name. Prior to Oct. 1, and, therefore, at the time of the contract between sellers and buyers, the matter as between the sellers and Azur appeared to have been conducted orally. There is no evidence that the buyers were aware either of Azur's "impecuniosity" or their position vis-à-vis the manufacturers, except that they had an option. As the credit, although transferable, was to be opened in their name, the buyers might, if they had considered the matter, have assumed their relationship with the manufacturers was a close one, and that they might still be parties to the sale of the steel, perhaps at a higher price and profit, if the buyers failed in their obligations to the sellers.

I have come, with respect, to the conclusion that there is not sufficient evidence, applying the learned judge's principle as between sellers and buyers which I have quoted, to justify the extension of that principle to any claim Azur may have against the sellers. I think it is too remote. The learned judge, in making the declaration which he did, followed with modification a declaration made in somewhat similar circumstances by LEWIS, J., in Household Machines, Ltd. v. Cosmos Exporters, Ltd. (7). The problem can be shortly stated. B sues C for breach of contract. The court holds that B is entitled as against C to recover damages in respect of B's liability to A arising out of C's breach of contract. At the time of the hearing, B is not in a position to call evidence to quantify this damage. There may be some cases in which the court can state a principle which makes the subsequent quantification of this damage simple. On the other hand, difficult questions may arise, depending for example (i) on any variation of the terms of the contract between B and C as between B and A, (ii) on the question whether A took the steps which should have been taken to mitigate damage. No declarations ought to prejudice or preclude a proper determination of these issues, on which the defendant should be entitled to be heard. It might, as it seems to me, be more satisfactory if there were liberty to apply for directions as to the determination of these issues, if any, and quantification of damages under this head as between sellers and buyers, should disputes arise. Some order in this form, at any rate, in some cases, might be more satisfactory than a declaration in the form ordered. I think the appeal should be allowed to the extent I have stated.

DENNING, L.J.: This is another case concerned with the modern practice whereby a buyer agrees to provide a banker's confirmed credit in favour of the seller. This credit is an irrevocable promise by a banker to pay money to the seller in return for the shipping documents. One reason for this practice is because the seller wishes to be assured in advance, not only that the buyer is in earnest, but also that he, the seller, will get his money when he delivers the goods. Another reason is because the seller often has expenses to pay in connection with the goods and he wishes to use the credit to pay those expenses. He may, for instance, be himself a merchant, who is buying the goods from the growers or the manufacturers and has to pay for them before he can get delivery, and his own bank may only grant him facilities for the purpose if he has the backing of a letter of credit. The ability of the seller to carry out the transaction is, therefore, dependent on the buyer's providing the letter of credit, and for this reason the seller stipulates that the credit should be provided at a specified time well in advance of the time for delivery of the goods.

What is the legal position of such a stipulation? Sometimes it is a condition precedent to the formation of a contract, that is, it is a condition which must be fulfilled before any contract is concluded at all. In those cases the stipulation "subject to the opening of a letter of credit" is rather like a stipulation "subject to contract". If no credit is provided, there is no contract between the parties. In other cases a contract is concluded and the stipulation for a credit is a condition which is an essential term of the contract. In those cases the provision of the credit is a condition precedent, not to the formation of a contract, but to the obligation of the seller to deliver the goods. If the buyer fails to provide the credit, the seller can treat himself as discharged from any further performance of the contract and can sue the buyer for damages for not providing the credit.

The first question is: What was the nature of the stipulation in this case? When the buyers sent their order, they stated in writing on Sept. 25, 1950, that "a credit will be opened forthwith". It was suggested that the buyers were not making any firm promise on their own account, but were only passing on information which had been given to them by their American buyers. The judge did not accept that suggestion and I agree with him. The statement was a firm promise by the buyers by which they gave their personal assurance that a credit would be opened forthwith. At that time there were some discrepancies about gauges and dates of delivery which had to be cleared up, but these were all resolved at the meetings in Brussels, and there was then, as the judge found, a concluded contract by the sellers to sell, and the buyers to buy, the steel for December/January delivery, and it was a part of that contract that the buyers would be personally responsible for seeing that a credit should be opened forthwith. On those findings it is clear that the stipulation for a credit was not a condition precedent to the formation of any contract at all. It was a condition which was an essential term of a contract actually made. That condition was not fulfilled. The sellers extended the time for the credit, but it never came, not even after reasonable notice. The sellers were, therefore, discharged from any further performance on their side, and are entitled to claim damages.

But what is the measure of damages? That is the important question in the case. The price of the goods had steadily risen from the date of the contract onwards and the buyers say that the sellers could at any time have re-sold the goods for more than the contract price, and are, therefore, only entitled to nominal damages. If the claim of the sellers had been for damages for non-acceptance of goods or for repudiation of the obligation to take delivery, then the damages would, no doubt, be nominal. But it is none of those things. It is a claim for damages for not providing a letter of credit. The buyers say that, even so, the credit is only a way of paying the price, and that the damages recoverable on that score are only nominal because the seller could re-sell the goods at a profit. This argument reminds me of the argument we heard in Pavia & Co., S.P.A. v. Thurmann-Nielsen (8). It treats the obligation to provide a credit as the same thing as the obligation to pay the price. That is, I think, a mistake. A banker's confirmed credit is a different thing from payment. It is an assurance in advance that the seller will get paid. It is even more than that. It is a chose in action which is of immediate benefit to the seller. It is irrevocable by the banker, and it is often expressly made transferable by the seller. The seller may be relying on it to get the goods himself. If it is not provided, the seller may be prevented from getting the goods at all. The damages he will then suffer will not, in fact, be nominal. Even if the market price of the goods has risen, he will not be able to take advantage of the rise because he will not have any goods to re-sell. His loss will be the profit which he would have made if the credit had been provided. Is he entitled to recover that loss? I think he is, if he can show that such a loss was at the time of the contract foreseeable by the buyer as the probable consequence of a breach: see the Victoria Laundry case (2). That was clearly the case here. The buyers knew that the sellers could not get the goods at all unless the credit was provided. The foreseeable loss was the loss of profit, no matter whether the market price of the goods went up or down. It is, therefore, the proper measure of damages.

It was said that the breach here was a failure to pay money and that the law has never allowed any damages on that account. I do not think that the law has ever taken up such a rigid standpoint. It did undoubtedly refuse to award interest until the introduction of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3 (1): see London, Chatham & Dover Ry. Co. v. South Eastern Ry. Co. (9); but the ground was that interest was "generally presumed not to be within the contemplation of the parties": see BULLEN & LEAKE, 3rd ed., p. 51, note (a). That is, I think, the only real ground on which damages can be refused for non-payment of money. It is because the consequences are as a rule too remote. But when the circumstances are such that there is a special loss foreseeable at the time of the contract as the consequence of non-payment, then I think such loss may well be recoverable. It is not necessary, however, to come to a firm conclusion on this point, because I regard the provision of a credit as different from the payment of money and not subject to the special rules, if any there are, relating thereto.

It was also said that the damage was the result of the impecuniosity of the sellers and that it was a rule of law that such damage is too remote. I do not think there is any such rule. In the case of a breach of contract, it depends on whether the damage was reasonably foreseeable or not. In the present case it clearly was.

There is one way, however, in which the buyer might be able to rely on the rise in price. It might be a ground for mitigation of damages. I can well understand that the buyer might in some cases be able to say that the seller ought to have offered the goods elsewhere and got some one else to provide a letter of credit. But no such case can be made here. The sellers acted very reasonably throughout. They kept the matter open for the buyers in the hope and expectation that the credit would be provided, and eventually lost their own option because the credit was not provided. They have, therefore, lost their profit without any fault on their part and are entitled to recover it from the buyers as damages.

The only remaining question is whether the sellers are entitled to be indemnified for any damages they may have to pay the Azur company who were selling to them. I think not. That is a special loss which was not within the contemplation of the parties to this contract. The buyers did not know that the Azur company depended on the credit in order to get the goods themselves. The buyers had no reason to suppose that, on a rising market, the Azur company would have any claim against the sellers. This head of damage is, therefore, not recoverable. I would only add that I agree with my Lord that, even if this head of damages was recoverable, it is not correct to make a declaration of indemnity. If the liability of the sellers to a third party was within the contemplation of the parties, but has not yet been assessed, then the proper course for the judge is to reserve that head of damages. Judgment can be entered for the damages already ascertained leaving the rest to be ascertained later by the same or another judge.

I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed as to the declaration but dismissed as to the money award.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree with the judgments which have been delivered and with the proposed order. I only desire to make two observations. First, I am not, as at present advised, prepared to subscribe to the view that in no case can damages be recovered for non-payment of money. I agree with DENNING, L.J., that in certain circumstances such damages might well be recoverable provided that the loss occasioned to the plaintiff by the defendant's default was reasonably within the contemplation of the parties when the bargain between them was made. Secondly, I am also in agreement with my brethren that there is no rigid rule that damage suffered by a plaintiff and resulting from his own impecuniosity is in all cases too remote to be recoverable in an action based on breach of contract.

Appeal allowed in part.

Solicitors: A. & G. Tooth (for the buyers); Hardman, Phillips & Mann (for the sellers).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

WILBRAHAM v. COLCLOUGH AND OTHERS.

[BIRMINGHAM WINTER ASSIZES (Jones, J.), March 13, 14, 26, 1952.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Service—Service on agent of tenant—Person responsible for farming in occupation with knowledge of tenant—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 92 (3).

A In 1914 the tenant of a farm under a tenancy from year to year died, having by his will appointed his widow and his elder son, W., his executors. The widow remained in possession of the farm and farmed it with the help of her second son, R. On July 7, 1949, the widow died, having by her will appointed W. and R. her executors. On July 19, in the belief that the widow had been the tenant of the farm, the landlord's agent sent a notice to quit the farm addressed to W. and R. as the widow's executors.

B HELD: when the notice to quit was served W. was the tenant of the farm as sole surviving executor under his father's will, but, as W. and R. had been in possession of the farm with W.'s knowledge and were responsible for the farming, they were to be regarded as W.'s agents within s. 92 (3) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and, therefore, the notice to quit served on them was duly served under the sub-section and was effective to determine the tenancy.

C FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1948, s. 92, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 28, p. 92.

Cases referred to:

(1) Egerton v. Rutter, [1951] 1 K.B. 472.

D (2) Phipps (P.) & Co. (Northampton & Towcester Breweries), Ltd. v. Rogers, [1925] 1 K.B. 14; 93 L.J.K.B. 1009; 132 L.T. 240; 89 J.P. 1; 31 Digest, Replacement, 496, 6221.

(3) Re Bebington's Tenancy, [1921] 1 Ch. 559; 90 L.J.Ch. 269; 124 L.T. 661; 31 Digest, Replacement, 500, 6256.

E ACTION for possession of a farm at Alsager, Cheshire.

From 1897 to his death in 1914 James Colclough, the father of the three defendants, was tenant of the farm from year to year under a tenancy agreement running from Feb. 2 to Feb. 2. By his will he appointed his widow, his eldest son (William Colclough, the first defendant), and one, Barker, his executors and trustees. The widow continued to live in the farm house and to farm the land. F After a time William Colclough became tenant of an adjoining farm, but another brother, Reginald Colclough (also a defendant), remained to help the widow on the farm. Until 1939 the agent of the landlord (the plaintiff), sent demands for rent addressed to the executors of James Colclough, but in that year, being under the impression that the widow was herself the tenant, he gave instructions that future demands should be sent to her. On July 7, 1949, the widow died. On G July 13 the landlord's agent wrote to Reginald Colclough asking if the widow had made a will, and, if so, to be informed of the names of her executors. A solicitor instructed by Reginald Colclough replied to that letter on the assumption that the widow had been the tenant and asked for a grant of the tenancy of the farm to Reginald Colclough and his sister. On July 17 Barker, James Colclough's third executor, died, and William Colclough became the sole surviving trustee of his father's estate. On July 19 the landlord's agent wrote to the solicitor H enclosing a notice to quit addressed to William Colclough and Reginald Colclough as executors of the widow. In that notice the widow was referred to as the tenant, and it was stated that the notice to quit had been given because of her death. The defendants contended that the notice to quit was invalid.

L. A. Blundell for the landlord.

Mynett for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 26. JONES, J., stated the facts and continued: I hold that, when the notice to quit was sent on July 19, 1949, the tenant of the farm was William Colclough as sole surviving executor and trustee under his father's will. For many years the widow had acted as the tenant of the farm and she was regarded as the tenant by her children as well as by the landlord's agent, though William Colclough, as trustee under his father's will, should have known that she was not the tenant. It is clear that after his mother's death he thought that he and his brother were carrying on the farm as their mother's executors. In these circumstances I think that the widow's executors should be regarded as agents for the real tenant as they were in possession of the farm with his knowledge and were responsible for the farming, and that by virtue of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 92 (3), the notice given to them was a notice duly given to William Colclough. I think that, on the authority of Egerton v. Rutter (1), and the cases referred to in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., the notice was effective to determine the tenancy as it was given to the persons who were, and who claimed to be, in possession of the farm at the time that the notice was served. The notice was given to the real tenant, William Colclough, although it was addressed to him and his brother and was given to his brother as well.

Counsel for the defendants referred to P. Phipps & Co. (Northampton & Worcester Breweries,) Ltd. v. Rogers (2), and Re Bebington's Tenancy (3), and contended that the notice was uncertain and ambiguous. The notice seems to me to be clear though not addressed to the real tenant. Counsel also submitted that the notice had misled the defendants. It was not the notice, but their own mistake, and, particularly, the mistake of William Colclough, which misled them. It is true that the letter of the landlord's agent may have encouraged that mistake, but it is equally true to say that the agent was encouraged in his mistake by the reply from the solicitor instructed by Reginald Colclough. The defendants allege that they failed to serve a counter-notice under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 24 (1), because they were misled by the notice to quit and they seek to blame the plaintiff's agent for that because he referred to the widow as tenant, but, as I have said, William Colclough should have known who was the tenant in view of the fact that he must at some time have done some act as an executor and trustee of his father's will. Therefore, the landlord is entitled to possession of the farm and to mesne profits.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Solicitors: Walters and Hart (for the landlord); Gibson & Weldon, agents for Robert Bygött & Sons, Crewe (for the defendants).

[Reported by MISS GWYNEDD LEWIS, Barrister-at-Law.]

BRATTER & CO. (GREAT BRITAIN), LTD. v. JAMES CLARK (BRUSH MATERIALS), LTD.

ed in part. C.A. [1952] 2 All 197.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), March 19, April 1, 1952.]

Contract — Non-performance — Excuse — "Force majeure" — Delivery of goods "subject to export licence" — Minimum export prices fixed in excess of contract prices.

A A contract for the shipping of goods from Brazil during February to July, 1951, provided that the contract should be void for any quantity which was not shipped one month after the expiration of the contract period where shipment was prevented by force majeure, and that "this contract is subject to a Brazilian export licence." In June, 1951, the sellers gave the buyers notice that they could not ship the goods on the basis of the contract prices because the Bank of Brazil had stated that the goods could only be shipped at minimum f.o.b. prices which were £28 and £40 a ton respectively higher for the two classes of goods involved than the contract prices. If they had themselves paid the minimum higher prices the sellers could have obtained a licence to export the contract goods and shipped, declared, and tendered them within the contractual period.

B HELD: the sellers were relieved from liability under the contract, not (in the absence of any prohibition or embargo or physical or legal prevention of export) by the "force majeure" clause, but by the clause making it conditional on the grant of an export licence, which meant a licence for the shipping of goods in fulfilment of the contract at the prices specified therein and not at other prices which would have involved another contract.

D Cases referred to:

- (1) Lebeaupin v. Crispin (R.) & Co., [1920] 2 K.B. 714; 89 L.J.K.B. 1024; 124 L.T. 124; 12 Digest, Replacement, 430, 3307.
- (2) Blythe & Co. v. Richards, Turpin & Co., (1916), 85 L.J.K.B. 1425; 114 L.T. 753; 12 Digest, Replacement, 462, 3446.
- E (3) Re Comptoir Commercial Anversois and Power, Son & Co., [1920] 1 K.B. 868; 89 L.J.K.B. 849; 122 L.T. 567; 12 Digest, Replacement, 449, 3389.
- (4) Tennants (Lancashire), Ltd. v. Wilson (C. S.) & Co., Ltd., [1917] A.C. 495; 86 L.J.K.B. 1191; 116 L.T. 780; 12 Digest, Replacement, 449, 3387.

AS TO EXCUSES FOR NON-PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT, see HALSBURY, F Hailsham Edn., Vol. 7, pp. 197-227, paras. 276-310; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement, Vol. 12, pp. 356-495, Nos. 2761-3716.

SPECIAL CASE stated by arbitrators.

G The sellers (the appellants) had given notice that they were unable to ship goods from Brazil in accordance with a c.i.f. contract with the buyers owing to a statement by the Bank of Brazil that the goods could only be shipped at minimum f.o.b. prices £28 and £40 a ton higher than the contract prices. They claimed to be relieved from liability under the contract by a printed force majeure clause and by a typewritten clause making the contract "subject to a Brazilian export licence". The dispute was referred to arbitration in accordance with the conditions of sale, which were those of the Seed, Oil, Cake and General Produce Association. The arbitrators disagreed, but on the appointment of a third arbitrator under the conditions of sale made an award in favour of the buyers. The sellers appealed to the Board of Appeal appointed in accordance with the conditions of sale and requested that the award of the board should be stated in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the court. Subject to the decision of the court on the question of law the board made an award for £3,000 in favour of the buyers. The questions stated for the opinion of the court were: (i) Did the refusal of the Bank of Brazil or other Brazilian authorities to grant licences for the export of the goods, except at prices higher than the prices contained in the contract, excuse the sellers from fulfilling the contract by reason of the force majeure clause? (ii) Did it do so by reason of the export licence clause?

E. W. Roskill for the sellers.

T. G. Roche for the buyers.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1. SELLERS, J., read the following judgment. The sellers under the c.i.f. contract into which they had entered with the buyers were under an obligation to ship the goods specified in the contract (quantities of Bahia piassava) from Salvador, in Brazil, during February to July, 1951, inclusive. On June 20, 1951, the sellers informed the buyers that it was impossible for them to ship the goods on the basis of the contract prices owing to the intervention of a section of the Bank of Brazil. The Bank of Brazil had, apparently, at some date and in some form, not specified, stated that Bahia piassava could only be shipped at the minimum f.o.b. prices of £180 a ton in the cut stiff, and £135 a ton for the seconds, which prices were £28 and £40 respectively higher than the contract prices.

The sellers claimed protection under the force majeure clause in the contract, as their inability to fulfil the contract, they alleged, was due solely to the Brazilian authorities. The buyers were offered three courses:—(a) to cancel the contract, (b) to accept the new prices, (c) to take the matter to arbitration. The buyers went to arbitration and thereby treated the contract as terminated. After a third arbitrator had been appointed, the arbitrators found in favour of the buyers. The Board of Appeal have likewise found in favour of the buyers, subject to the decision of the court.

The sellers were clearly refusing to fulfil their obligation to ship the contractual goods, and were in fundamental, but anticipatory, breach of their contract unless they were excused, as they alleged they were, by an express term in the contract. No frustration is alleged. The sellers rely first on the printed cl. 9:

“Should shipment be prevented or delayed owing to . . . force majeure . . . shipper shall be entitled at the termination of such cause to an extension of time for shipment of as much time as was left for shipment prior to the outbreak of such cause or causes, but such extension shall in no case exceed one month. In case of non-fulfilment under above conditions, the date of default shall be similarly dealt with. Shipper shall give notice by cable within two days after the last day for shipment if he claims an extension of time for shipment. If, from any of the above causes, shipment be not completed within one month after the expiration of the original contract period then this contract is to be void for any unfulfilled quantity.”

The sellers rely secondly on an added typewritten clause:

“This contract is subject to a Brazilian export licence.”

On behalf of the buyers, it was submitted that this was not a case of force majeure, but, even if it were, the sellers did not act in accordance with cl. 9 and seek an extension and endeavour to fulfil their obligation to ship within the extended period. The sellers did not wait to see if the restriction was removed before the latest time for shipment expired, and there is no indication in the Case that the position altered in any way or that there was a termination of the cause which would have entitled the sellers to a further month for shipment under the contract. In the circumstances, if the shipment was prevented by force majeure, the whole contract would be void under cl. 9.

The phrase “force majeure” and its use in English commercial contracts was the subject of a review of the authorities by McCARDIE, J., in Lebeaupin v. R. Crispin & Co. (1). He said ([1920] 2 K.B. 720):

“I take it that a ‘force majeure’ clause should be construed in each case with a close attention to the words which precede or follow it, and with a due regard to the nature and general terms of the contract. The effect of the clause may vary with each instrument."

And in another sentence on which the sellers' argument relied he held that (ibid., 719):

"Any direct legislative or administrative interference would of course come within the term: for example, an embargo."

A The buyers relied on the authorities which established that "prevention" in such circumstances means physical or legal prevention, and that a rise in price would not of itself amount to a "prevention" of delivery: Blythe & Co. v. Richards, Turpin & Co. (2), Re Comptoir Commercial Anversoix and Power, Son & Co. (3), and Tennants (Lancashire), Ltd. v. C. S. Wilson & Co., Ltd. (4).

B It would have been difficult for this court to decide the question of force majeure without the precise terms of the Brazilian government's order and instruction to the bank requiring a minimum f.o.b. price before export of the commodities in question would be allowed, and these are not disclosed. The object of the government's intervention would appear to be to bring more foreign exchange into Brazil for the goods which the country exported. That it should
C be done peremptorily and without protecting existing contracts is, indeed, an interference with private trading which is calculated to create dissatisfaction and to give rise to litigation.

In the circumstances, however, I do not feel able to embark on a further investigation of this ground on which the sellers relied originally, and before me. The award finds under (g) that the sellers admitted before the Appeal Committee
D that they could have shipped, declared and tendered the contract goods within the contractual date if they had paid the minimum price. On this admission, the sellers cannot, in my opinion, rely on force majeure. There was no prohibition, no embargo, no physical or legal prevention. The goods could have been exported.

The sellers also rely on the typewritten clause: "Subject to a Brazilian export licence". This clause has to be read, I think, in the light of the printed cl. 9
E which clearly gave protection to the sellers if shipment were prevented and delayed owing to prohibition of export and force majeure amongst other causes. The clause must be read in reference to the contract the parties were making and no other, and, therefore, in my opinion, the clause must be read as subject to a Brazilian export licence for the fulfilment of this contract. If the sellers could not, with due diligence, obtain a licence to export the goods to fulfil the contract

F into which they had entered, they are excused. In finding (h) in the Case, it appears that the sellers admitted that a licence would have been granted on or about June 20, 1951, for the shipment of the goods if the sellers had paid the minimum higher prices, but that is a licence for the performance of another contract, not the one into which the parties had entered. There is no indication of what the machinery was for obtaining a licence. One might surmise that the

G authorities would require to see the contract and the price the foreign buyers had agreed to pay, and that it would not be complying with the letter of the law for the sellers to pay any balance so as to bring the price up to the minimum price. If the sellers were resident in Brazil, and there were no London agents or associates, as here, any additional payment by the sellers in respect of goods of their own supply or manufacture, or of goods purchased locally to fulfil the H contract, would not bring in any additional foreign currency. The foreign buyers would still pay their contract price and no more.

If the clause does not protect the sellers in this case, one asks whether it could protect them if the minimum price f.o.b. for an export licence to be granted were raised to the extent of one hundred times the contract price, so that a contract, for instance, at £10 a ton had to be met by the sellers at a price of £1,000 a ton. I do not think any such obligation was in contemplation of the parties. What they contemplated was that the sellers would use due diligence to obtain an April licence to fulfil a contract into which they had entered. As it chanced, the restriction was directed against a price less than a specified minimum. It was no different in essence from a restriction against, for instance, exporting to London. The sellers had to run the risks of the market in respect of goods and freight, and cannot complain that prices have gone against them so that to fulfil the contract would be unprofitable. But I see no reason to place on the sellers a burden of loss which, on the buyers' argument, would be imposed on them, even to an unlimited extent, at the whim of the government when they have provided in their contract the clause on which they now rely. So to hold would, I am inclined to think, wholly limit the effect of the clause to a case of embargo or complete prohibition, and that is already provided for in the contract. In my judgment, the Board of Appeal have erred in law in their view of this clause. The answer of the court to question (i) is No, and to question (ii) Yes.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co., agents for Bartlett & Son, Liverpool (for the sellers); Layton & Co. (for the buyers).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS OF ENGLAND v. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK, LTD., AND OTHERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker and Lord Cohen), February 20, 21, 26, 27, 28, April 3, 1952.]

Charity—Benefit to community—Promotion of surgery—Incidental benefits to individuals—Gift to Royal College of Surgeons.

Perpetuities—Rule against perpetuities—Gift over from one charity to another—Second charity incorporated by royal charter.

Will—Gift to medical school of hospital—Gift over if hospital nationalised or passes into public ownership—Medical school not nationalised.

By her will, dated Jan. 13, 1943, a testatrix, who died on Feb. 10, 1943, gave her residuary real and personal estate on the usual trusts for conversion and directed that the resulting "endowment fund" should be held on "the following charitable trusts" which were, inter alia, "to pay the residue of the income of the endowment fund in each year to the treasurer . . . of the Middlesex Hospital for the maintenance and benefit of the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology now carried on in connection with the said hospital . . . Provided always that should the . . . Middlesex Hospital become nationalised or by any means pass into public ownership or should the [trustees] at any time become unable lawfully to apply the income of the endowment fund for the purposes aforesaid then and in any of the said events the [trustees] shall thereupon pay and transfer the endowment fund . . . to the Royal College of Surgeons . . ." The Middlesex Hospital was founded in or about 1745. A medical school was founded in 1835, but the school did not form part of the hospital until 1896. The Bland-Sutton Institute was a department of the medical school. On July 5, 1948, under the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 11 (8), the hospital was designated a teaching hospital, and, by virtue of s. 6 (1) of the Act, the property and liabilities of the hospital were transferred to and vested in the Minister of Health, but the medical school became a separate legal entity with a governing body constituted under s. 15 (1) of the Act. The Royal College of Surgeons claimed that, by reason of the changes brought about by the Act, the gift over took effect.

HELD: (i) notwithstanding that the medical school of the Middlesex Hospital had not been nationalised, the institution known and referred to in the will as "the Middlesex Hospital" had become nationalised within the meaning of the will, and, therefore, the defeasance clause took effect;

(ii) (LORD COHEN dissentiente) on the true construction of the royal charter, granted in 1800, by which the Royal College of Surgeons was incorporated the objects of the college were "the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the art and science of surgery" and were directed to the relief of human suffering or to the advancement of education or science and not to the promotion of the interests of individuals, although incidentally individuals carrying on their profession as surgeons did derive certain benefits from the college;

(iii) for the present purpose there was no distinction between a charity incorporated by royal charter and one incorporated by any other means; and, therefore, the college was a charity, and the gift over to it was not bad for perpetuity.

Re Royal College of Surgeons of England ([1899] 1 Q.B. 871), explained and criticised.

Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (1849) (1 Mac. & G. 460), applied.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL, sub nom. Re Bland-Sutton's Will Trusts ([1951] 1 All E.R. 494), reversed.

AS TO GIFTS FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 4, pp. 116-118, paras. 153, 154; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 8, pp. 245-248, Nos. 51-73.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Royal College of Surgeons of England, Re, [1899] 1 Q.B. 871; 68 L.J.Q.B. 613; 80 L.T. 611; sub nom. Royal College of Surgeons of England v. Inland Revenue Comrs., 4 Tax Cas. 344; 39 Digest 299, 1781.
- (2) Institution of Civil Engineers v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1932] 1 K.B. 149; 100 L.J.K.B. 705; 145 L.T. 553; 16 Tax Cas. 158; Digest Supp.
- (3) Christ's Hospital v. Grainger, (1849), 1 Mac. & G. 460; 19 L.J.Ch. 33; 15 L.T.O.S. 497; 13 J.P. 778; 41 E.R. 1343; 8 Digest 324, 1060.
- (4) Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., [1944] 2 All E.R. 293; [1944] K.B. 718; 113 L.J.K.B. 513; 171 L.T. 113; 37 B.W.C.C. 51; affd. H.L., [1946] 1 All E.R. 98; [1946] A.C. 163; 115 L.J.K.B. 63; 174 L.T. 39; 38 B.W.C.C. 48; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Hancock v. Watson, [1902] A.C. 14; 71 L.J.Ch. 149; 85 L.T. 729; 43 Digest 644, 792.
- (6) Re Tyler, [1891] 3 Ch. 252; 60 L.J.Ch. 686; 65 L.T. 367; 8 Digest 327, 1100.
- (7) Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel, [1891] A.C. 531; 61 L.J.Q.B. 265; 65 L.T. 621; 55 J.P. 805; 3 Tax Cas. 53; 8 Digest 241, 1.
- (8) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Forrest, (1890), 15 App. Cas. 334; 60 L.J.Q.B. 281; 63 L.T. 36; 54 J.P. 772; 3 Tax Cas. 117; 39 Digest 299, 780.
- (9) Society of Writers to the Signet v. Inland Revenue Comrs., (1886), 14 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 34; 28 Digest 13, m.
- (10) Sulley v. Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh, (1892), 29 S.L.R. 620; 3 Tax Cas. 173; 28 Digest 13, o.
- (11) Miley v. A.-G., [1918] 1 I.R. 455.
- (12) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Scott, [1892] 2 Q.B. 152; 61 L.J.Q.B. 432; 67 L.T. 173; 56 J.P. 632; 3 Tax Cas. 134; 8 Digest 264, 265.
- (13) Wenlock (Baroness) v. River Dee Co., (1883), 36 Ch.D. 675, n.; 57 L.T. 402, n.; affd. H.L., (1885), 10 App. Cas. 354; 54 L.J.Q.B. 577; 53 L.T. 62; 49 J.P. 773; 13 Digest 367, 1002.
- (14) Re Lopes, [1931] 2 Ch. 130; 100 L.J.Ch. 295; 146 L.T. 8; Digest Supp.
- (15) Jenkin v. Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, [1921] 1 Ch. 392; 90 L.J.Ch. 47; 124 L.T. 309; 13 Digest 359, 944.

APPEAL by the Royal College of Surgeons of England against an order of the Court of Appeal dated Feb. 2, 1951, and reported [1951] 1 All E.R. 494, affirming (on different grounds) an order of DANCKWERTS, J., dated July 7, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 466.

DANCKWERTS, J., held that the coming into operation of the National Health Service Act, 1946, had not caused the Middlesex Hospital to become "nationalised" within the meaning of that term as employed in the will of Lady (Edith Goff) Bland-Sutton, and that, accordingly, the defeasance clause in the said will did not defeat the gift therein to the Middlesex Hospital for the benefit of a department of the medical school. He also held that the Royal College of Surgeons was a charity, so that, if the defeasance clause had operated, the ultimate gift to the college would have been capable of taking effect.

The Court of Appeal held that the defeasance clause did operate, but that the college was not a charity. Having regard to the rule in Hancock v. Watson (5), the court further held that the gift to the medical school was absolute.

Cross, Q.C., and L. J. M. Smith for the Royal College of Surgeons of England.
N. S. S. Warren for the executors and trustees of the will.

S. Pascoe Hayward, Q.C., and R. W. Goff for the Council of the Middlesex Hospital Medical School.

The House took time for consideration.

Apr. 3. The following opinions were read.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinion about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, and I agree with it. I propose, therefore, only to discuss the single question on which there is a difference of opinion among your Lordships who heard the appeal—the question whether the Royal College is in law a charity. The question as it is now presented was not, as has been explained by my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, before the Court of Appeal when it decided that the Royal College was not entitled to exemption from the duty imposed by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, s. 11: Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (1).

The decision in this case depends primarily on the construction of the constituent documents of the college, and, particularly, the charter granted by King George III in 1800, for it is to these documents that we naturally look in order to discover what are the objects for which the college was instituted. The peculiarity of the charter of 1800 is that the objects are nowhere set out or described eo nomine. The operative part of this document confers powers and imposes duties and provides for the appointment of officers of the college and generally for the carrying on of the college as a body independent of the corporation of the City of London. But it nowhere states or even refers to the objects which the college exists to fulfil. In one of the recitals, however, it is said:

"It appears to us that the establishment of a college of surgeons will be expedient for the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science" of surgery. These words give the reasons moving the Crown to grant the charter, and, if there were elsewhere in the document a statement of the objects of the college incorporated by the charter, it would prevail over the recital. But, in the absence of any other clarification of the objects, the Crown's motive for making the grant may legitimately be regarded as coinciding with the objects of the college which the charter incorporated. That appears at least to be a more satisfactory way of arriving at a definition of the objects than by attempting to infer the objects from the powers, duties and machinery created to enable the college to carry them out. I am, therefore, prepared to hold that the objects are to be found in the recital which I have quoted.

If that be so, the next step is to construe that recital. The words "the study and practice of the . . . art and science" of surgery do not, in my opinion, mean

“ the academic study and professional practice of the art and science of surgery ”. They signify rather the acquisition of knowledge and skill in surgery both by abstract study and by the exercise of the art in the dissecting room and the anatomy theatre, and they are capable of covering both the discovery of new knowledge which is the fruit of research, and the learning of existing knowledge either by students who are qualifying or by qualified surgeons desirous of improving their knowledge and skill. On that construction, the professed objects of the college all fall into the categories of the advancement of science or of the advancement of education, and are charitable. Nothing in the later part of the charter or the later charters induces me to modify that construction. A clause is inserted to exclude the jurisdiction of the corporation of the City of London. The reason for that is that the Corporation of Surgeons which had been created by Act of Parliament in the reign of George II, and which had been dissolved for some time before 1800, was a trade guild subject to the civic jurisdiction, and in 1800 it was intended that the new college should have an independent and a higher status. If the present Royal College were a successor of a trade guild carrying on the objects of such a guild, I doubt whether it could make good its claim to be a charity. But the clauses of the charter are not so conceived as to re-constitute the dissolved trade guild. They leave no doubt that a new and different body was being established, though there are provisions vesting in the new body the gifts, grants, liberties, privileges, immunities and possessions of the old body and giving its officers the same powers to transact business as were possessed by the officers of the old body. All of these provisions are, I think, to be interpreted as machinery provisions subserving the ends or objects of the new college as defined by the recital.

There is also a power to make bye-laws for the regulation, government and advantage of the college. It was said that this power had been used in order to further the professional interests of the members of the college. I shall assume that such a use, even if it were a misuse of the power, would be evidence on which it would be proper to hold that the college was not, or was no longer, a charity. By bye-law 15, the council of the college undertakes at all times to protect and defend every fellow, fellow in dental surgery, member and licentiate in dental surgery, of the college in the exercise and enjoyment of the rights and privileges acquired by him as a diplomate of the college. Bye-law 16 gives the college power to discipline members adjudged guilty of professional misconduct or convicted of a crime. In my opinion, these bye-laws are in the strictest sense bye-laws for the regulation, government and advantage of the college. The professional advantage which might accrue to individuals from the protection promised them in the exercise and enjoyment of the rights and privileges acquired by them as diplomates of the college is but the inevitable and incidental result of a provision intended to secure the dignity and honour of the college to which they owe their diploma. So, also, the disciplinary power is a power necessary for the success and good name of the college, and only incidentally advantageous to the individual diplomates. To hold that these bye-laws negative the claim of the college to be a charitable institution would be inconsistent with the decision in Institution of Civil Engineers v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), for the rights and privileges of members of the institution and its powers of discipline over them seem to me to be entirely comparable to the corresponding rights, privileges and powers in this case. I, therefore, concur with my noble and learned friend in the motions which he will propose.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, the appellant, the Royal College of Surgeons of England (hereafter referred to as “ the college ”) claims that on July 5, 1948, it became absolutely entitled to the “ endowment fund ” created by the will of the testatrix, Lady Bland-Sutton. This claim is resisted by the second respondent, hereafter referred to as “ the medical school ”.

The testatrix made her will on Jan. 13, 1943, and died on Feb. 10, 1943. The only relevant clauses of her will are cl. 2, cl. 10 and cl. 11. By cl. 2 the testatrix appointed National Provincial Bank, Ltd. (the first respondent to this appeal) to be the executor and trustee of her will. By cl. 10 the testatrix gave all the residue of her real and personal estate to the bank on the usual trusts for sale and conversion and directed the bank to hold the net proceeds of such sale and conversion and the investments for the time being representing the same (which she called "the endowment fund") "upon the following charitable trusts for so long as the law shall permit". By sub-cl. (1) of cl. 10 the testatrix directed the bank to pay the annual sum therein mentioned to the college for the purpose of maintaining a Bland-Sutton Research Scholarship in the Bernard Baron Laboratories at the college on the terms and conditions therein mentioned. By sub-cl. (2) she directed the bank

"to pay the residue of the income of the endowment fund in each year to the treasurer or other proper officer of the Middlesex Hospital for the maintenance and benefit of the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology now carried on in connection with the said hospital."

Clause 11 of the will is as follows:

"Provided always that should the said Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology cease to be carried on as a pathological research institution or should its name be changed or should the Middlesex Hospital become nationalised or by any means pass into public ownership or should the bank at any time become unable lawfully to apply the income of the endowment fund for the purposes aforesaid then and in any of the said events the bank shall thereupon pay and transfer the endowment fund (both as to the capital and the income thereof) to the said Royal College of Surgeons absolutely for the general purposes of the said college and the receipt of the treasurer or other proper officer thereof shall be a full and sufficient discharge to the bank therefor."

It will at once be apparent that one or other of the events specified in cl. 11 of the will might happen at any time in the future, however remote. Accordingly, the gift over to the college is void as offending the rule against perpetuities unless the college can establish that it is a charity and comes within the exception to that rule which was established by the well-known case of Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3).

Down to July 5, 1948, the "appointed day" under the National Health Service Act, 1946, no difficulty arose as to the effect of the will, but doubts then arose as to the effect of the provisions of that Act on the trusts declared by the will, and the bank took out an originating summons to have the matters of doubt determined. The case came first before DANCKWERTS, J. He held that the college was a charity and that, for this reason, the gift over to the college was not rendered invalid by the rule against perpetuities. He held, however, that no one of the events mentioned in cl. 11 of the will had so far occurred. The Court of Appeal differed from DANCKWERTS, J., on each of these points. All the members of that court were of opinion that the Middlesex Hospital had been nationalised, within the meaning of cl. 11 of the will. They then considered the question whether the gift over to the college was valid, notwithstanding the rule against perpetuities, on the ground that the college is a charity. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., expressed himself as follows ([1951] 1 All E.R. 500):

"For, sympathising, as I am strongly inclined to do, with DANCKWERTS, J.'s own opinion of the nature of the purposes of the college, I am unable to escape the conclusion that, in conformity with the principles recently expounded in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co. (4), the court is bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (1) to conclude that the college fails to qualify as a charity."

JENKINS, L.J., said (ibid., 513):

“Having regard to the decision of this court in the 1899 case [i.e., Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (1)] as to the nature of the college’s objects, I do not think it was open to the learned judge or is now open to this court to deal with the matter in that way.”

A And HODSON, L.J. (ibid., 517) was of opinion that

“... the court ought to consider itself bound in the circumstances of this case by the opinion expressed by the court in 1899 in Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (1).”

It will be convenient to refer to the case by which the members of the Court of Appeal considered themselves bound as “the 1899 case”. The result was that the Court of Appeal held the gift over to be void for remoteness, as that court felt bound to hold that the college was not a charity. It was conceded that on this footing the gift of income contained in cl. 10 (2) of the will would continue on foot as a gift of income for charitable purposes for an indefinite period, in accordance with the principle laid down in Hancock v. Watson (5). The college now appeals, and submits that the Middlesex Hospital was nationalised on July 5, 1948, within the meaning of cl. 11 of the will; that the college is a charity; and that the gift over in favour of the college is, therefore, valid and effective.

My Lords, I propose first to consider whether the Middlesex Hospital has become nationalised, within the meaning of cl. 11 of the will. It is not now suggested that any one of the other events mentioned in that clause has occurred. The relevant facts in regard to the Middlesex Hospital, the Medical School, and the Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology referred to in the testatrix’ will have been so admirably summarised by JENKINS, L.J., that I shall take the liberty of quoting the portion of his judgment which deals with these matters (ibid., 505):

“The Middlesex Hospital was incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1836, but had then already been in existence for more than ninety years. Teaching in the wards of the hospital had begun in 1745, but the medical school associated with it was not founded until 1835. Down to 1896 the school, though associated with, did not form part of, the hospital. In that year it became part of the hospital under a scheme of amalgamation which was adopted by the weekly board of governors of the hospital on July 28, 1896. Under this scheme the hospital took over the property and liabilities of the school and the school became and thereafter down to July 5, 1948 (being the appointed day under the National Health Service Act, 1946), remained a department of the hospital, though in practice it enjoyed a considerable degree of autonomy in the management of its affairs (through a council constituted for the purpose under the scheme), and its accounts were kept separate from those of the hospital. In 1900, on the reconstitution of the University of London, the school became a school of the university. This did not affect the legal position of the school as a department of the hospital, but involved recognition of the school by the university as one where London University medical students might take their training, and the university became the examining body of the school to which it also made grants. The Bland-Sutton Institute of Pathology referred to in the testatrix’s will was opened in 1914 as part of the school in a building for which a sum of money had been provided by Sir John Bland-Sutton in 1913. The school has always been housed on the same site as the hospital, and the buildings devoted to the purposes of the school (including the institute building) are physically connected, and one might say intermixed, with those of the hospital as distinct from the school.”

The learned lord justice went on to set out the relevant provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, in order to show what was the effect of that Act on the hospital and the medical school. I am relieved from the necessity of embarking on this task because it is now common ground that the hospital, divested of the assets and liabilities of the school, was "nationalised" on July 5, 1948, while the medical school, which was an important department of the hospital down to July 5, 1948, has not been nationalised.

In these circumstances, has the event happened which the testatrix expressed in the words "should the Middlesex Hospital become nationalised"? I would answer this question in the affirmative, and I can state my reasons very shortly as I am in agreement with the reasoning and the conclusion of the Court of Appeal. I think the test to be applied is: Has the institution to which the testatrix referred as "the Middlesex Hospital" ceased to exist? If it is still in existence, there is no doubt that it has been nationalised. The argument of counsel for the second respondent involves the proposition that, if any part of the property of the hospital, as it existed prior to the appointed day, were exempted from the process of nationalisation, the institution which became nationalised on the appointed day would not be "the Middlesex Hospital" within the meaning of cl. 11 of the will. In my view, this contention gives a very artificial meaning to cl. 11 and I cannot accept it. Moreover, I agree with the Court of Appeal that there are indications in the will which support the view taken by that court. Each member of the court relied on these indications and the matter is dealt with most fully by JENKINS, L.J., who said (ibid., 510):

"Apart from the natural meaning of the testatrix's reference to 'the Middlesex Hospital' there are indications in cl. 10 (2) and cl. 11 which seem to me on the whole to support the conclusion to which I have come. She refers, in cl. 10 (2), to 'the Bland-Sutton Institution of Pathology now carried on in connection with the Middlesex Hospital'. That form of words seems to me to suggest that she regarded the institute as connected with, but distinct from, the hospital itself; and I think the word 'now' in the phrase 'now carried on' also holds a suggestion that the institution referred to as 'the Middlesex Hospital' had existed, and might continue to exist, as such without the Bland-Sutton Institute—and inferentially without the school of which the institute formed part. Further, cl. 11 contains no reference to the nationalisation of the institute. The relevant event contemplated is the nationalisation of the hospital. If the testatrix's concept of nationalisation of the hospital had been such as the learned judge has held it to be, it would surely have been more natural for her to refer to nationalisation of the institute itself. As it is, the language she has used seems to contemplate the possibility of the hospital becoming nationalised in the sense in which she uses that expression without nationalisation of the institute 'carried on in connection' with it, or inferentially of the school of which the institute formed part."

The result is that the gift over in cl. 11 of the will has taken effect in favour of the college, unless that gift over is rendered invalid by the rule against perpetuities. Counsel for the college contends that his client is a charity, in the legal sense of the word, and that the rule against perpetuities has no application to a gift over from one charity to another. In support of the latter proposition he relies on Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3). Counsel for the medical school contends, first, that the college is not a charity, and, secondly, that, even if the college is a charity, the rule in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3) does not apply to a case where the charity designated to take under the gift over is a body incorporated by royal charter.

My Lords, it will, I think, be convenient to deal with this latter submission before coming to the only question which was argued at any length in your Lordships' House, viz.: Is the college a charity? The submission is a novel one, for the industry of counsel could not discover any case in which it had been put forward in the 103 years which have elapsed since the decision in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3). In that case, the Corporation of London, as governors of Christ's Hospital, claimed certain property which had been left by the testator, John Hendricke, in 1624, to the corporation of Reading, for certain charitable purposes in that town, with a direction that if the donees should for a year neglect, omit, or fail to perform the directions of his will, such gift should be utterly void, and should forthwith be paid and transferred to the Corporation of London for the benefit of Christ's Hospital. The strict execution of the directions of the will having been found inconvenient, an information was filed by the Attorney-General in the Court of Exchequer against the Corporations of London and Reading, which led to a decree in 1639, varying the purposes and application of the charity, but still confined to Reading, and providing, as in the will, that if the Corporation of Reading should neglect to perform the directions of the decree, or should misemploy the trust property, and such neglect and misemployment should continue for a year, the legacy should be void and of no effect as to Reading, and that the property should be forthwith paid and transferred to the Corporation of London for the benefit of Christ's Hospital. It was clearly established that the directions of the decree, as well as those of the will, had been neglected for the period of far more than one year. It was argued that the gift over was void, as contrary to the rule against perpetuities, but the Lord Chancellor (LORD COTTENHAM) rejected this argument, saying (1 Mac. & G. 464):

"If the Corporation of Reading might hold the property for certain charities in Reading, why may not the Corporation of London hold it for the charity of Christ's Hospital in London?"

Certain portions of the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor in that case may be open to criticism, but his decision has always been treated as good law.

In Re Tyler (6) the testator had made a bequest in the following terms:

"I give to the trustees for the time being of the London Missionary Society the sum of £42,000 Russian 5 per cent. stock, with a rentcharge to my brother, Charles Tyler, Esq., of £1,000 a year for life. Also I commit to their keeping of the keys of my family vault at Highgate Cemetery, to the (sic) care and charge, my brothers to be buried in the vault if they wish, and to use the same, if they wish, for any member of the family, the same to be kept in good repair and name legible, and to rebuild when it shall require: failing to comply with this request, the money left to go to the Blue Coat School, Newgate Street, London."

STIRLING, J., said ([1891] 3 Ch. 254):

"The rule against perpetuities has no application to a transfer in a certain event from one charity to another, as is expressly laid down by LORD COTTENHAM in the case of Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3)", and held that the condition and gift over were good. An appeal from his decision was dismissed, and LINDLEY, L.J., said (ibid., 258):

"What is this gift when you come to look at it? It is a gift of £42,000 Russian 5 per cent. stock to the London Missionary Society. What for? It is for their charitable purposes. It is a gift to them for the purposes for which they exist. Then there is a gift over to another charity in a given event—that is to say, the non-repair of the testator's vault. It seems to me to fall precisely within the principle on which Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3) was decided. A gift to a charity for charitable purposes, with a gift over on an event which may be beyond the ordinary limit of perpetuities to another charity—I cannot see that there is anything illegal in this."

FRY, L.J., said (ibid., 259):

"In as much as both the donees of this fund, the first donee and the second, are charitable bodies, and are created for the purposes of charity, the rule of law against perpetuities has nothing whatever to do with the donees."

LOPES, L.J., concurred.

My Lords, there is not the slightest indication in Re Tyler (6), or in any other case cited by counsel, that any distinction is to be drawn between a charity incorporated by royal charter and any other charity, and text-book writers, down to the most modern editions, repeat the rule in general terms—see, for example, TUDOR ON CHARITIES, 5th ed., p. 81: "A gift over from one charity to another is never void for remoteness"; GRAY ON THE RULE AGAINST PERPETUITIES, 4th ed., p. 572; THEOBALD ON WILLS, 10th ed., pp. 280-1; JARMAN ON WILLS, 8th ed., p. 226; HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 25, p. 119. It cannot be doubted that many estates must have been distributed, within the last hundred years, on the footing that the rule as to a gift over from one charity to another is a general rule, as stated in Re Tyler (6) and in the text-books. In these circumstances, I apprehend that your Lordships would be most reluctant to introduce into the rule the new qualification suggested by counsel. Further, I am of opinion that there is no logical ground for this qualification. The reason why a gift to charity is not subject to the rule against perpetuities is stated by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (7) ([1891] A.C. 580):

"The Court of Chancery has always regarded with peculiar favour those trusts of a public nature which, according to the doctrine of the court derived from the piety of early times, are considered to be charitable. Charitable uses or trusts form a distinct head of equity. Their distinctive position is made the more conspicuous by the circumstance that owing to their nature they are not obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities, while a gift in perpetuity not being a charity is void."

My Lords, if the reason for upholding a gift to a charity for an indefinite period is that a charity in its nature is not obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities, I fail to see why the same reason should not apply to a gift over from any one charity to any other charity. For these reasons I reject the novel submission by counsel for the medical school which I have already set out.

My Lords, I now come to the last, and, in my view, the most important of the questions which arise on this appeal, viz., the question whether or not the college is a charity in the sense in which that word is used in English law. It is, in my view, regrettable that in order to find out what is or is not a charity according to English law, it is still necessary to refer to the preamble to a statute passed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. That statute (43 Eliz., c. 4) was not passed for the purpose of giving a definition of "charity", but was directed to providing for the reformation of abuses in the application of property devoted to charitable uses, and the whole of the Act, except the preamble, was repealed by the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, yet, in order to find a comprehensive definition of "charity", it is still necessary, first to turn to that Act, and then to consider a series of decisions in your Lordships' House and elsewhere, including Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (7). I take this opportunity of saying that I hope the legislature will soon embark on the task of giving a comprehensive statutory definition of "charity". In the present case, however, I do not think that a prolonged study of the statute of Elizabeth or of the subsequent cases on the meaning of the word "charity" is necessary and I turn at once to the charter granted by King George III on Mar. 22, 1800, by which the college was established, in order to discover what were the objects with which the college was established.

The charter first recites certain letters patent of King Edward IV, an Act of the reign of King Henry VIII, and certain letters patent of King Charles I, and then continues:

"And whereas by an Act of Parliament made and passed in the eighteenth year of the reign of our late Royal Grandfather King George II, intituled 'An Act for making the surgeons of London, and the barbers of London, two separate and distinct corporations,' It was enacted, that the said union and incorporation of the barbers and surgeons of London, made and effected by the aforesaid Act of the thirty-second year of King Henry VIII, should, from and after June 24, 1745, be dissolved and declared void and of no effect; and that such of the members of the said united company who were freemen of the said company, and admitted and approved surgeons, within the rules of the said company, and their successors, should from thenceforth be made, and they were thereby made and constituted, a separate and distinct body corporate and commonalty perpetual, which at all times thereafter were to be called by the name of Master, Governors and Commonalty of the art and science of Surgeons of London, and by the same name might implead and be impleaded before all manner of justices, in all courts, and in all manner of actions and suits, and take to them and their successors, lands, tenements, rents, or hereditaments, not exceeding the yearly value of £200 in the whole."

Now follow recitals which seem to me to be of the greatest importance:

"And whereas we are informed that the said Corporation of Master, Governors and Commonalty of the art and science of Surgeons of London hath become and now is dissolved: And whereas it is of great consequence to the commonweal of this kingdom that the art and science of surgeons should be duly promoted: And whereas it appears to us that the establishment of a college of surgeons will be expedient for the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science . . ."

Then begins the operative part of the charter:

"Now we . . . by these presents . . . do will, ordain, constitute and declare, give and grant unto the aforesaid James Earle and unto all the members of the said late Company or Corporation of Master, Governors and Commonalty of the art and science of Surgeons of London; having been admitted and approved surgeons within the rules of the said company; and also unto all such persons who upon or since the dissolution of the said corporation shall have obtained letters testimonial under a seal purporting to be the seal of the late dissolved corporation, authorising them to practice the art and science of surgery; and they from henceforth forever hereafter shall be and remain by virtue of these presents one body corporate and politic by the name of the Royal College of Surgeons in London and by the same name shall and may have perpetual succession and a common seal."

Then come powers for the college to acquire and use a hall or council house and other lands for the purposes of the college without incurring any of the penalties in any statutes of mortmain. The charter then goes on to sever the college from the City of London in the following terms:

"And it is our further will and pleasure that nothing in these presents shall be construed to give the Corporation of the City of London any power or jurisdiction over the said college hereby established and incorporated and that no person by virtue of these our letters patent, constituted or ordained or hereafter to be admitted a member of the said college shall be thereby entitled to any franchise belonging to the freemen of the City of London."

It is then provided that the college

"shall and may exercise and enjoy all and singular other gifts, grants, liberties, privileges and immunities, possessions real and personal . . . by any Act or Acts of Parliament or by any letters patent . . . given, granted and confirmed unto or otherwise lawfully acquired by and belonging to the said late Master, Governors and Commonalty of the art and science of Surgeons or any of them and not hereby altered, taken away, changed, or abridged, made void or annulled."

It is later provided that the college may elect twenty-one persons to be the Court of Assistants, ten of whom are to be examiners of surgeons for the college; and of these ten persons, one is to be principal master, and two others are to be governors. Power is given to the master and governors, together with ten or more of the members of the Court of Assistants, to hold courts and assemblies and "to make, ordain, confirm, annul or revoke from time to time such bye-laws, ordinances, rules, and constitutions as to them shall seem requisite and convenient for the regulation, government and advantage of the said college: so as such bye-laws, ordinances, rules, and constitutions be not contrary to law: and in all such cases as shall be necessary, be examined, approved of, and allowed, as by the laws and statutes of this realm is provided and required: and also to transact and ordain all such other matters and things as the master, governors, and Court of Assistants of the late dissolved Company or Corporation of the Master, Governors, and Commonalty of the art and science of Surgeons of London might heretofore lawfully do, transact or ordain."

Then follows an appointment of the first master, governors, examiners, and court of assistants, and provision is made for the election of successors in these offices from time to time. The conditions of membership are stated as follows:

"And it is our further will and pleasure that after the day of the date of these presents no person except those who before the day of the date of these presents were members of the late Corporation of Surgeons established by the said Act made and passed in the eighteenth year of the reign of our Royal Grandfather, King George II; and also excepting such persons as shall have received such letters testimonial as aforesaid under seal purporting to be the seal of the late dissolved company or corporation of surgeons, shall be capable of becoming a member of the said college hereby established, unless he shall have obtained letters testimonial of his qualification to practise the art and science of surgery under the common seal of the college hereby established; but every person who shall hereafter obtain such letters testimonial under the common seal of the college aforesaid, shall thereby, by virtue of such letters testimonial, become and be constituted a member of the said college, subject to all the regulations, provisions, and bye-laws of the said college."

The charter goes on to require the examiners of the college to examine candidates for the post of surgeon or assistant surgeon in the army or surgeon or surgeon's mate in the navy, and also to examine all surgeons' instruments to be used in the King's service, and proceeds:

"And further, we will that no court or courts for the examination of any person or persons touching their skill in surgery shall ever be held but in the presence of the master or one of the governors and five of the members at least of the Court of Examiners of the said college hereby established and incorporated as aforesaid."

The rest of the charter need not be quoted for the present purpose.

Your Lordships have heard much argument on the question where, in this charter, the object or objects of the college is or are set out. It is submitted on behalf of the medical school that the usual place in which to find the objects stated is in the operative part of a charter and not in the recitals; that the last recital merely states the reason of His Majesty for establishing the college and does not state what are to be the objects of the college when established; and that the recital which immediately precedes it is merely the statement of a platitude. My Lords, it may well be, that one would expect to find the object or objects stated in the operative part of a royal charter, but I can find no statement of the objects in the operative part of the document now under consideration, although I do find various provisions as to the means by which these objects are to be achieved, and various powers conferred for better enabling the college to achieve these objects. This being so, I have no doubt that the object of this newly created body, the college, is stated in the last recital and is "the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the art and science of surgery". As I read the words "study" and "practice" they embody two ideas, research in the laboratory and that practical experience which can only be gained by using surgical implements on human or other bodies. The object of the college is to promote the art and science of surgery by encouraging each of these activities.

My Lords, if this be the true construction of the original charter, can it be doubted that the college is a charity? The object just stated may be regarded as being directed to the relief of human suffering or to the advancement of education or science or to all of these ends. Each of these is a charitable end and it cannot be doubted that in the present case there is no lack of that element of public benefit which is essential if an institution is to be regarded as a charity. I cannot find in this recital any statement that one of the objects of the new college is to be the promotion of the interests of individuals who are carrying on their profession as surgeons, nor can I find any reference to the promotion of the interests of such individuals in any other part of this charter. I state this at once, in view of the observations of the Court of Appeal in the 1899 case (1), to which I must refer later.

So far, I have considered only the charter of 1800 by which the college was established, but the later charters, in so far as they are relevant, support my view that the object of the college is to be found in the last recital of the charter of 1800. In the charter of 1822 the last recital is:

"And whereas it appears to us to be expedient, in order more effectively to promote and encourage the study and practice of the said art and science of surgery, that further powers and privileges be granted to the said royal college" and the same words

"in order more effectively to promote and encourage the study and practice of the said art and science of surgery"

appear in the last recital to the charter of 1843. I refrain from any detailed reference to the other charters or to the bye-laws, as I cannot find, either in the charter of 1800, or in any subsequent charter, or in the bye-laws, any statement of the objects of the college, as distinct from the methods by which these objects are to be pursued.

My Lords, for these reasons, had the matter been wholly free from authority, I should have felt no doubt that the college was a charity. I must shortly consider the decision of the Court of Appeal in the 1899 case (1), by which the Court of Appeal has found itself bound, but it will be convenient to turn first to two cases which dealt with the position of the Institution of Civil Engineers. The first is Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Forrest (8), a decision of this House. The question which arose in that case was whether the Institution of Civil Engineers was liable to the duty imposed by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, s. 11, or came within the exemption granted by sub-s. (3) of that section. Sub-section (3) exempts from the duty in question

"property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts."

It was contended on behalf of the institution that its property was legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science, and your Lordships' House accepted this contention. It was argued by counsel for the Inland Revenue Commissioners that the main and primary object of the institution was to promote the interests of the profession of engineers and not to increase scientific knowledge. This argument was rejected by LORD WATSON and LORD MACNAGHTEN, LORD HALSBURY, L.C., dissenting. LORD WATSON said (15 A App. Cas. 351):

"I do not doubt that membership is accompanied with a certain amount of prestige which may prove to be of service to the member in his professional career; but I believe that the same result would attend membership of any society which effectively promoted a branch of science intimately connected with the profession or business in which the member was engaged. That there is a science of civil engineering, and that its development is of the utmost consequence to our national interests, are, to my mind propositions not admitting of dispute."

LORD MACNAGHTEN said (ibid., 354):

"... the question at issue may be stated shortly. Is the property of the Institution of Civil Engineers legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of the science of civil engineering, or is it legally appropriated and applied for the benefit of civil engineers in order to enable them to practise their profession to greater advantage? It cannot, I think, be doubted that the institution has raised the standard of the profession, and that to a civil engineer it is of advantage and probably of pecuniary advantage to be a member. But is that result the purpose of the society, or is it an incidental, though an important and perhaps a necessary consequence of the way in which the institution does its work in the pursuit of science?"

My Lords, I think that the words of LORD WATSON and LORD MACNAGHTEN may aptly be applied to the present case, with the substitution of "the college", "the science of surgery", and "surgeons" for "the Institution of Civil Engineers", "the science of civil engineering", and "civil engineers".

The matter was carried a stage further, as regards the Institution of Civil Engineers, by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Institution of Civil Engineers v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). In that case the question was whether the institution was "a body of persons . . . established for charitable purposes only" and was, therefore, exempt from income tax under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37 (1) (b). ROWLATT, J., held that the institution was not established for charitable purposes only. On the charter of the institution and its bye-laws he found that, although one of the objects of the institution was undoubtedly to enlarge the knowledge of mankind in regard to mechanical science, the institution had also as an object the organisation of the profession of civil engineers by giving to those who passed the necessary examination and became members of the institution the exclusive right to affix to their names certain designations. The members became known to the public as persons belonging to the institution, and as members they were required to observe certain rules for the protection of clients. That was collateral to the acquisition or spread of knowledge of mechanical science and was an object which could on no view be called charitable. His decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and LORD HANWORTH, after referring to the charter and bye-laws said ([1932] 1 K.B. 163):

"The question of law that arises upon these matters of fact is this: do these other activities represent a collateral or independent purpose, or are they subsidiary and incidental to the main object for which the institution was started and incorporated?"

He held that the latter was the true view, and LAWRENCE, L.J., in agreeing, said (ibid., 171), after referring to Forrest's case (8):

"... it follows in my judgment that the institution is established for a charitable purpose only, notwithstanding that it is of advantage to a civil engineer in his profession to be a member of the institution, this result not being a purpose for which the institution was established but being incidental to and consequent upon the way in which the institution carries out the charitable purpose for which alone it was established."

I have referred in detail to this decision of the Court of Appeal, because in Forrest's case (8), as LORD MACNAGHTEN pointed out, it was not necessary for this House to consider whether the promotion of science was the only purpose for which the property sought to be charged was legally appropriated and applied.

I now come to the 1899 case (1). In that case the Court of Appeal had to consider whether the college was liable to the duty imposed by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, s. 11 (the same section which had to be considered by your Lordships' House in Forrest's case (8)) or came within the exemption contained in sub-s. (3) of that section. Before the commissioners, the college had relied on the words "for the promotion of education, literature, science, or . . ." which appear in sub-s. (3). When the case came before a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division, it would appear that counsel relied only on the words "legally appropriated and applied . . . for the promotion of science", and this was the only argument put forward when the case came before the Court of Appeal. It is difficult to understand why counsel did not rely on the words "for any charitable purpose" and why they ceased to rely on the words "for the promotion of education", as both of these purposes come within the exemption conferred by sub-s. (3). However, both the argument in the Court of Appeal and the judgment of the court, which was delivered by ROMER, L.J., concentrated on the words "legally appropriated and applied . . . for the promotion of science". ROMER, L.J., said ([1899] 1 Q.B. 876):

"It is contended by the appellants that the property is exempt from duty under sub-s. (3) of s. 11 of the Act as being property which, or the income or profits whereof is . . . legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science. In order to see whether this contention is correct or not, it is important to ascertain what is the main purpose and object of the college."

After referring to Forrest's case (8) he continued (ibid., 877):

"Now the case before us differs essentially from the case . . . of the Institution of Civil Engineers before the House of Lords. That institution had only one main object and purpose. The college has two main objects, each of great importance, in fact, it would be difficult to say which of the two main functions imposed on and discharged by the college is the more important. Neither can be considered as merely subsidiary to the other. The one may be shortly described as the promotion of the science of surgery. The other is the promotion and encouragement of the practice of surgery, including the promotion of the interests of those practising, or about to practise, surgery as a profession, and also including the examination of students and others to qualify for practice or honours in surgery or kindred subjects."

My Lords, I need quote no more of the judgment, for these words reveal at once the difference between the view which I hold of the construction of the charters and the view taken by the Court of Appeal in the 1899 case (1). If I understand the judgment aright, that court thought that "the promotion of the interests of those practising, or about to practise, surgery as a profession" was one of the main objects of the college. I do not so read the charters. I think that the promotion of the interests of practising surgeons is "an incidental, though an important and, perhaps, a necessary consequence" of the work of the college in carrying out its main object, the promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the art and science of surgery. The distinction between an institution whose main object is the promotion and advancement of a science and an institution whose main object is the protection and advantage of those practising a particular profession is well illustrated by a comparison of the judgments in the two cases, already cited, relating to the Institution of Civil Engineers, with the judgments in the Society of Writers to the Signet v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (9), and Sulley v. Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh (10). Counsel for the medical school relied on Miley v. A.-G. (11). In that case the Court of Appeal in Ireland held that the College of Surgeons in Ireland was incorporated with two main objects, the promotion of the science of surgery and the promotion of the interests of those practising the profession of surgery, the latter not being a charitable object. It was accordingly held that a legacy to that college was not a charitable bequest. The language of the charters of the Irish college appears to differ in some respects from the language of the charters now under consideration, and the decision may be justified on that account, but I think that BARTON, J., in the court of first instance, and two at least of the members of the Court of Appeal attached importance to the views on construction which had been expressed by the English Court of Appeal in the 1899 case (1), and I have already expressed my disagreement with these views. The arguments on this point before your Lordships' House ranged over a wide field, and many portions of the charters and bye-laws were relied on as showing that the protection of the interests of the profession was one of the main objects of the college. I have anxiously considered all these arguments, but I have decided not to increase the length of this speech by discussing them in detail. Suffice it to say that, in my view, each and all of the powers conferred on the college and the regulations made by the charters and bye-laws were powers and regulations conferred and made for the purpose only of enabling the college the better to achieve its charitable objects, and any benefit to the profession resulting from the exercise of these powers or the carrying out of these regulations was incidental to the carrying out of the main purpose for which the college was incorporated, as stated in the last recital of the charter of 1800. I have already stated the construction which I place on that recital.

I would add that, in my opinion, your Lordships could not decide against the college in this case without drawing too fine a distinction between the relevant documents in the case of the Institution of Civil Engineers and the relevant documents in the present case. It is true that in the first charter of that institution, dated June 3, 1828, it appears that the institution was the direct successor of a society formed and the institution is stated to be formed "for the purposes aforesaid". But if I am right in thinking that the last recital to the college's charter of 1800 states the object of the college and that object is charitable, there is no distinction, so far, between the college and the institution, and a general comparison of the charters and bye-laws of these two bodies respectively leads me to think that it would be very difficult to draw a distinction between them in favour of the Institution of Civil Engineers.

"for the general advancement of mechanical science and more particularly for promoting the acquisition of that species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer"

I have not referred to the evidence filed in this case, because it is said that the manner in which the college has in fact carried out its functions is irrelevant for the present purpose. I am content to assume that this is so, and I have not relied on that evidence in any way in reaching my conclusion, but it is satisfactory to learn, from the affidavit of Lord Webb-Johnson, how well-founded have been the happy expectations expressed in the charter of 1800. I would allow the appeal and declare that the proviso contained in cl. 11 of the will of the testatrix is valid and has come into operation and that on July 5, 1948, the endowment fund referred to in cl. 10 of the said will became transferable to the college for the general purposes of the college. In the special circumstances of this case I would leave undisturbed the order of the Court of Appeal as to costs and would direct that the costs of the appeal to this House be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid out of the corpus of the said endowment fund.

LORD REID: My Lords, I agree and I shall only add a few observations on the question whether the college is a charity. I do not think that great precision can be expected in the definition in old charters of the objects of an institution. In the absence of any contemporanea expositio, I think that it is enough that all the indications in the charters point to the object of the college being the advancement of the knowledge and skill necessary for successful surgery and not the advancement of the professional position of its individual members. I do not think that the intention of the charter of 1800 was to make the new college like the old city corporation which had already been dissolved. It is true that the court of assistants was given power to transact and ordain such matters and things as the old corporation might lawfully have done, but this appears to me to have been intended to confer powers of administration and not to have been intended to expand the object set out in the recitals "the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science" i.e., the art and science of surgery. If there were anything to show that the affairs of the college had been so conducted that the advancement of the interests of its members had become one of its main purposes, it may be that this would disentitle the college from pleading that it is a charity, but I do not find anything of that kind. The bye-laws give disciplinary powers and provide for the protection of fellows and members in the exercise and enjoyment of their rights and privileges as fellows and members, but I do not think that this means that they are to be disciplined, protected or aided as practising surgeons. As I read it, it refers only to their position as fellows and members of the college, and the powers are powers which any college might have for its own protection. And I can find nothing in the affidavit of Lord Webb-Johnson which indicates a departure from the original object of the college.

It is true that in Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (1) the Court of Appeal took a somewhat different view. There the case for the college was that its property was legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science, and the court held, I think rightly, that this was not the only purpose for which the property was held and used. The promotion of science is one way of promoting the study and practice of the art and science of surgery, but it is not the only way. It appears that the college has for long made the examination of students one of its main purposes. I would not regard that as the promotion of science, but I would regard it as the promotion of education and within the general object of the college. For some reason which cannot now be discovered, the college did not maintain in 1899 that in so far as its property was not applied to the promotion of science it was applied to the promotion of education. Had it done so I think that it ought to have succeeded. I do not think that it could have relied on the words "or for any charitable purpose" in s. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, because it had been decided in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Scott (12) that, in that particular statute, those words are used in a narrow sense. The difficulty created by the 1899 case (1) arises from the way in which ROMER, L.J., described the second, non-scientific, object of the college. He referred to it ([1899] 1 Q.B. 877) as including not only the examination of students and others, but also " . . . the promotion and encouragement of the practice of surgery, including the promotion of the interests of those practising or about to practice surgery as a profession ",

It is the last part of the passage I have quoted which I venture to think is going too far. I think that promoting the practice of surgery is a different thing from promoting the interests of those who practise surgery. Surgery obviously has a practical as well as a scientific side: it is an art as well as a science. When the charter speaks of promoting the practice of the art of surgery I think that it refers to promoting the practical side of surgery and not to promoting the interests of those practising surgery, and I think that the evidence in this case shows that the college has carried out the intention of its charter.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, the Court of Appeal were unanimous in holding that on the true construction of cl. 11 of the will of the late Lady (Edith Goff) Bland-Sutton, the Middlesex Hospital had, in the events which happened, "become nationalised" within the meaning of that clause, with the result that the gift over, if valid, took effect. I agree and have nothing to add on this part of the case.

In your Lordships' House a new point not relied on in the Court of Appeal was advanced by the respondents to the effect that the gift over was not saved from the rule against perpetuities unless both before and after the gift over takes effect the property in question is inalienable because it is held on trust and that the property of the Royal College of Surgeons, a body incorporated by charter, is not impressed with a trust nor is the corporation subject to the doctrine of ultra vires as in the case of statutory corporations. It is said that the language used by LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3) in 1848 was wider than was necessary for the decision on the facts of that case and that it has ever since been erroneously considered to apply in all cases where the gift over is from one charity to another. On this point I agree with your Lordships that the real reason for this exception to the rule against perpetuities is to be found in the fact that the court leans in favour of charity, and that in any event an interpretation which has been accepted and acted on for more than a hundred years should not now be disturbed.

The last and more difficult question is whether the gift over can in any event take effect in favour of the Royal College of Surgeons—in other words: Are the objects of the college exclusively charitable?, which can for the sake of brevity be expressed as: Is the college a charity? DANCKWERTS, J., held that it is, but the Court of Appeal felt themselves compelled to the contrary view by the construction which had been placed on the charters of the college by the Court of Appeal in Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (1) in a judgment delivered by ROMER, L.J., in which it was held that the college had two main objects: (i) the promotion of the science of surgery, and, (ii) the promotion and encouragement of the practice of surgery, including the promotion of the interests of those practising or about to practise surgery as a profession, and also including the examination of students and others to qualify for practice in honours in surgery. In that case the court was concerned with an exemption in favour of "property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied . . . for the promotion of . . . science . . ." under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, s. 11. But although the question in issue was different from that in the present case it did necessitate an inquiry into the purposes of the college as shown in its charters and it was held that the college had the two main objects stated above neither of which could be considered as subsidiary to the other. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal in the instant case felt bound to proceed on the basis of the existence of these two main objects with the necessary consequence that the college could not be held to be a charity. My Lords, although I do not question the correctness of the actual decision of the Court of Appeal in the 1899 case (1), I am unable to accept the construction put on the charters by the court. The relevant passage in the first charter of 1800 is in the fifth paragraph of the recitals and is as follows:

"And whereas we are informed that the said Corporation of Master, Governors and Commonalty of the art and science of Surgeons of London hath become and now is dissolved: And whereas it is of great consequence to the commonweal of this kingdom that the art and science of surgeons shall be duly promoted: And whereas it appears to us that the establishment of a college of surgeons will be expedient for the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science, now we . . . do will, ordain, constitute and declare, give and grant . . . ”

A Similar language is used in the subsequent charters of 1822 and 1843.

Nowhere in the operative parts of the charters are there to be found any expressed objects, but it is, I think, clear from the language of the charters taken as a whole that the objects of the college in the present case are to be found in the recitals taken in conjunction with what follows in the operative parts, and, indeed, the charters were so construed by the Court of Appeal in the 1899 case (1). In my view, the objects of the college as set out in the charter of 1800, and never thereafter varied, were (i) the promotion of the science of surgery; (ii) the promotion of education in surgery. The latter can only be achieved by practice as well as study and the holding of examinations is an essential step in the educational process. I can find nothing to warrant the view that in this context the word “practice” means the carrying on of their professional activities for pecuniary gain by the members of the college or the profession at large. The remaining provisions of the charters and the bye-laws made pursuant thereto are all governed by the language of the recital and are to be construed as conferring the necessary powers incidental to the previously expressed purposes of the college. The fact that provision is made for some measure of disciplinary control over the members, and that the college undertakes to protect its fellows, members and licentiates in the exercise and enjoyment of the rights and privileges acquired by them as diplomates of the college (bye-law 15) are examples of such incidental powers, there being nothing in the charters to suggest that the college was established to further the interests of the profession or the enforcement of professional discipline.

E It was argued that, whatever is the proper construction to be put on the words in the recital standing by themselves, yet, having regard to the fact that the college was established in place of the dissolved company called “The Master, Governors and Commonalty of the art and science of Surgeons of London” and was expressly given power

F “to transact and ordain all such other matters and things as the master, etc., of the late dissolved company or corporation might heretofore lawfully do, transact, or ordain,” it was thereby given powers co-extensive with those of the dissolved corporation, the precise objects of which are not known, but whose members enjoyed certain liberties and franchises within the City of London and as to which there are no grounds for presuming it to have been a charity. It does not, however, appear from the charter that the college was in every respect a successor to the previous company. The old company had ceased to exist. We do not know the date. A new body was created. It was expressly provided that the corporation of the City of London should have no jurisdiction over the college and that no member of the college should by virtue of the charter be entitled to any franchise belonging to the freedom of the city of London. The college, however, enjoyed all the other privileges and possessions granted by previous Acts or letters patent or otherwise acquired by the former company. We have, therefore, a new entity divorced from the city—with no guild taint attaching to it—but holding the property of the old company and having expressly conferred on it one of the functions of the old company, viz., the dissecting and anatomising of the bodies of murderers. It is, however, expressly established for the purposes previously stated, and I cannot find anything in the charter to suggest that its objects are intended to be extended by implication beyond the promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of surgery. No provision is made for a general meeting of the members of the college, but the conduct of its business and the power to make bye-laws, etc., is committed to a court of assistants on whom are conferred the same powers as were vested in the court of assistants of the dissolved company. This is merely the machinery of government and does not extend the powers of the college beyond what is necessary for carrying out the previously expressed purposes for which it had been established. I am, accordingly, of opinion that on the true construction of its charters the Royal College of Surgeons of England is a charity, and that this appeal should succeed. A

LORD COHEN: My Lords, I agree with your Lordships that the event on the occurrence of which the testatrix directed that the gift over in favour of the Royal College of Surgeons (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "the college") should take effect has taken place and I cannot usefully add anything to the reasons given by your Lordships for affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal on that point. B

The gift over may obviously take effect beyond the time allowed by the rule against perpetuities. It can only be valid, therefore, if it can be brought within the exception in favour of charities which was laid down by LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3) in the following terms (1 Mac. & G. 464): C

"It was then argued that it [a gift over in favour of the corporation of London for the benefit of Christ's Hospital] was void, as contrary to the rules against perpetuities. These rules are to prevent, in the cases to which they apply, property from being inalienable beyond certain periods. Is this effect produced, and are these rules invaded by the transfer, in a certain event, of property from one charity to another? If the Corporation of Reading might hold the property for certain charities in Reading, why may not the Corporation of London hold it for the charity of Christ's Hospital in London? The property is neither more nor less alienable on that account." D

Counsel for the medical school said that the college is not a charity which comes within the exception recognised in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3) for two reasons: (i) that the exception only applies to cases where property is given over to trustees on charitable trusts and not to cases of a gift over direct to a charitable corporation incorporated by Royal Charter; (ii) in any event the Royal College of Surgeons is not a charitable corporation since one of its main objects is in effect the object of a professional protection society and this is not charitable. The first point was taken in the court below, but only in order that it should be reserved for this House. We have not the assistance of the Court of Appeal on it. It derives support from the judgment of RONAN, L.J., in the Irish case of Miley v. A.-G. (11) and is based on the passage in LORD COTTENHAM's judgment in which he gave as the reason for his decision that the property did not become more or less inalienable by reason of a gift over from one charity to another. This, said counsel, cannot apply to a gift over from a charity created by declaration of trust to a corporation incorporated by royal charter since such a corporation has all the powers of an individual: see Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Co. (13). If it disregards some expressed limitation in its charter, it is not acting ultra vires. It cannot be restrained by injunction if it disregards the limitation; it only runs the risk that on an application by the Attorney-General by writ of scire facias its charter may be rescinded. A gift over to a chartered corporation cannot, therefore, be said to fulfil the condition that the property should be neither more nor less inalienable. E F G

In my opinion, this argument is not well founded. In the first place, the exception has always been regarded by text-book writers in the hundred years that have elapsed since the case was decided as applying to all charities whether their charitable character was derived from a document creating a trust or from the terms of a charter. Secondly, although there is no direct decision on the H point, the decision in Re Tyler (6) proceeded on the basis that a gift over from the trustees of charity A to charity B, a charitable corporation incorporated by royal charter, is valid. In Re Lopes (14) it was admitted by counsel ([1931] 2 Ch. 133) that such a gift over was valid. Thirdly, even if the decision in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3) is, as suggested in GRAY ON THE RULE AGAINST PERPETUITIES, 4th ed., pp. 572-578, illogical, we should make matters worse if we were to accept the argument of counsel for the medical school on this point. The policy behind the decision in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger (3) was, in my opinion, the leaning of the court in favour of charity. I can see no reason why that leaning should prevail in favour of charitable trusts declared by a will or trust instrument and yet be disregarded when the gift over takes the form of a direct gift to a charitable corporation.

Before parting with this branch of the case, I would add that the statement by counsel for the medical school that a corporation incorporated by royal charter cannot be restrained by injunction from disregarding a restriction imposed by its charter is too wide. It has been held that such an injunction will be granted at the instance of a member since a member should be allowed to prevent his rights being defeated by an application by the Attorney-General to rescind the charter: see Jenkin v. Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain (15). Moreover, in some cases, at any rate, charitable corporations are by reason of their charitable objects necessarily trustees of their corporate property and are, therefore, like other trustees, subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery: see HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 4, p. 336, para. 566.

The second point, to my mind, presents much greater difficulty. Counsel for the medical school suggested that we could not decide against him unless we were prepared to overrule the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Royal College of Surgeons of England (1). That was a step which the Court of Appeal in the present case did not consider themselves at liberty to take, and there are undoubtedly dicta in the judgment of the court which lend support to their view. I agree, however, with DANCKWERTS, J., that the question which we have to decide was not really before the Court of Appeal in the 1899 case (1). That was a decision on the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, s. 11, which granted exemption from corporation duty inter alia on

"property which, or the income or profits whereof, shall be legally appropriated and applied for any purpose connected with any religious persuasion, or for any charitable purpose, or for the promotion of education, literature, science, or the fine arts."

In the 1899 case (1) the college did not rely on the words "for any charitable purpose", nor on the word "education". An issue, and the only relevant issue, argued and decided was whether or not the income or profits derived from the property of the college was legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science. The Court of Appeal decided this question against the college.

ROMER, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the court, relied very largely on those provisions of the charter which dealt with the examining functions of the college. These were, undoubtedly, important functions and could hardly be said to be purely ancillary to its other objects. It may well be that they cannot be said to be purposes connected with the promotion of science, but we are concerned with the wider question of charitable objects in general, one of which is education. In my opinion, the examining functions of the college are so much connected with education that I do not think they deprive the college of any charitable character which it might otherwise possess. I have not overlooked that in the 1899 case (1) ROMER, L.J., said ([1899] 1 Q.B. 877):

"It was finally determined by the House of Lords in the case of Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Forrest (8), that if the main purpose and object of an institution be the promotion of science, though there may be some subsidiary purposes or objects, then its property, having to be applied and being applied for the purposes of the institution, is legally appropriated and applied for the promotion of science within the meaning of these words as used in the Act, and is accordingly exempt from duty. Now the case before us differs essentially from the case . . . of the Institution of Civil Engineers before the House of Lords. That institution had only one main object and purpose. The college has two main objects, each of great importance, in fact, it would be difficult to say which of the two main functions imposed on and discharged by the college is the more important. Neither can be considered as merely subsidiary to the other. The one may be shortly described as the promotion of the science of surgery. The other is the promotion and encouragement of the practice of surgery, including the promotion of the interests of those practising, or about to practise, surgery as a profession, and also including the examination of students and others to qualify for practice or honours in surgery or kindred subjects."

I can well understand that the Court of Appeal felt a difficulty in view of those observations in deciding the present case against the respondent, but the observations should be read in the light of the point to which the Court of Appeal was then directing its attention. I think, therefore, that even if we now decide in favour of the college, it does not necessarily follow that the decision in the 1899 case (1) was wrong on the question then decided in the light of the evidence then before the court.

Our attention was also directed to cases in which the character of the bodies in Scotland and Ireland corresponding to the Royal College of Surgeons in England arose for consideration. In the Scottish case (Sulley v. Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh (10)) the question was whether the defendants could claim exemption from income tax under sched. A [of the Income Tax Act, 1842] in respect of a building on the ground that it was

"property of [a] literary or scientific institution . . . used solely for the purposes of such institution, and in which no payment is made . . . for any instruction there afforded, by lectures or otherwise."

It was held that the defendants were not a scientific institution and, therefore, not entitled to exemption. The court came to the conclusion on the evidence in that case that the defendants' primary and proximate objects were professional, that its methods squared with the requirements of the profession, and that, if it furthered research, it did so only incidentally and indirectly: see per the Lord President (29 S.L.R. 623). Both the facts in that case and the question for decision differed so much from the case before us that I do not get any assistance from it in deciding the present case. In the Irish case (Miley v. A.-G. (11)), the question for decision was similar to that before us. The court held that the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland had been incorporated with two main objects, the promotion of the science of surgery and the promotion of the interests of those practising the profession of surgery, and that the latter was not a charitable object. The only evidence before the court were the charter and the bye-laws of the college, and it appears from the judgment of SIR IGNATIUS O'BRIEN, C. ([1918] 1 I.R. 462) and of MOLONY, L.J. (ibid., 475) that the charter itself contained elaborate provisions for disciplining the members of the Irish college and others connected with the profession, and that the oath required of licentiates was of a more professional character than that required of the governors and examiners of the college. The Chancellor said (ibid., 462-3):

"I am satisfied from a consideration of these and other clauses to be found in the charters that by the incorporation of this body with such great powers there was to be effected the second great object I have mentioned—that of keeping the profession of surgeons honourable in its conduct, and of ensuring its discipline, so that anything in the nature of unprofessional conduct could be punished by the corporate body. It was further pointed out in the course of the argument that until comparatively recent times the system of apprenticeship prevailed, under which a youth was apprenticed to a member of the body in the same manner as to a land agent or stockbroker. This apprenticeship might be either indoor or external; it was open to the body to regulate the fees and emoluments of the member to whom an apprentice was bound, and it might also insist that no one should be admitted as a licentiate unless he had been previously apprenticed to a member of the body. It would also be open and legitimate to the body to expend money on providing the necessary machinery for the detection or prevention of anything which might be regarded as casting a slur on the honour and character of the profession."

MOLONY, L.J., referred also to the bye-laws which contained strong indications—particular in defining the duties of the general purposes committee—of a professional objective. He said (ibid., 478):

"It is clear, therefore, that one of the objects of the college is to become acquainted with all intended legislation, and to take all proper steps to safeguard the interests of the profession, and in furtherance of this object, if need be, to send deputations to London or elsewhere on the business of the college, and to pay the expense of such deputations out of the corporate funds. This object is, no doubt, very useful, but in no sense can it be regarded as charitable."

The differences between the charters and bye-laws of the Irish college and those of the Royal College of Surgeons in England are, however, such that I cannot regard the decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland as a decision of the question we have to consider.

Counsel for the medical school said that it was clear from the charters of the college and its bye-laws that it had objects which were not exclusively charitable, and that, as it had non-charitable objects which were not to be accomplished only in the course of and in pursuit of the main charitable objects, the appeal must necessarily fail. Counsel for the college, on the other hand, contended that the main objects of the college were clearly charitable and that, if or in so far as it had other objects, such other objects were purely ancillary to the main objects. He relied on the two last recitals in the charter of 1800 and the last recitals in the charter of 1822 and the charter of 1843 respectively as declaring the objects of the college in terms which he argued were clearly charitable. He also referred to the paragraphs in Lord Webb-Johnson's affidavit which deal with the current activities of the college. I doubt whether this latter evidence is admissible. We are concerned, not with what the college is in fact doing now, but with what it is authorised to do, and I do not think we are entitled to construe its charters of 1800, 1822 and 1843 by evidence of its actions in 1948. In support of his argument, counsel referred us to two decisions in relation to the Institution of Civil Engineers. In the first (Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Forrest (8)) the question was as to the right of the institution to exemption from duty under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, s. 11. The House held that the institution was entitled to exemption as being formed, not for the professional ends of individuals, but for the promotion of science within s. 11. In the second (Institution of Civil Engineers v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2)) the question was whether the institution was established for charitable purposes only within the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 37 (1) (b). The Court of Appeal decided in favour of the institution. The charter of the institution contained a recital similar to the last recitals in the charter of 1800 of the college to the effect that it was in the national interest to establish an institution for "the general advancement of mechanical science and more particularly for promoting the acquisition of the species of knowledge which constitutes the profession of a civil engineer, being the art of directing the great sources of power in nature for the use and convenience of man."

The charter of the institution differed from the charter of 1800 of the college in that it expressly declared that the institution was incorporated for the purpose specified in the recital. This seems to me a material difference as it clearly defines the main purpose of the institution. I cannot, therefore, agree with counsel that the decision of the Court of Appeal as to the status of the college in 1899 was, or that any decision we might give in favour of the respondents in the present case would necessarily be, inconsistent with the decisions of the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal on the status of the Institution of Civil Engineers. I do, however, find assistance from certain passages in the judgments of the Court of Appeal. Thus, LORD HANWORTH, M.R., says ([1932] 1 K.B. 161):

"As ROWLATT, J., has said, there may be a charitable institution for the relief of sickness, and incidental advantages can be gained by a subscriber to the funds, without the institution losing its character; but if there is an object, e.g., the promotion of the profession in addition to the promotion of science that is collateral and not merely incidental, the result is that the institution cannot be described as established for charitable purposes only. I confess that I have a difficulty in attaching the same weight as was given to it by the commissioners and the learned judge to the fact that members of the institution can attach letters as suffixes to their names. The requirement of the institution whereby its members have to possess an adequate qualification does not appear to me to connote an advantage, amounting to a collateral purpose in the sense above. That its members should bring a certain knowledge and capacity for learning to the institution seems only to confirm its purpose of the general advancement of mechanical science and knowledge."

Then, again, he refers (ibid., 166) to an observation of LORD MACNAGHTEN when he points out that where a society is incorporated and its purpose defined by charter or statute, it is not right to confuse the purpose of the society with the objects of individuals in joining it.

With these principles in mind I return to the charters and bye-laws of the college and would refer first to the last two recitals in the charter of 1800 which read as follows:

"And whereas, it is of great consequence to the commonweal of this kingdom, that the art and science of surgery should be duly promoted: And whereas, it appears to us, that the establishment of a college of surgeons will be expedient for the due promotion and encouragement of the study and practice of the said art and science."

Had these been the only recitals and had the charter gone on to provide, as did the charter of the Institution of Civil Engineers, that the college was incorporated for the purposes specified in the recitals, I should, I think, have agreed with your Lordships that the only main object of the college was charitable and that any professional object which might be deduced from the reference to the practice of the art of surgery was merely ancillary to the main object. This view would have been reinforced by the concluding recitals in the charters of 1822 and 1843. Unfortunately, the words of incorporation do not contain any direct reference to the material recitals and these are preceded by an historical account of the predecessors in title of the college all of which appear to have been in the nature of trade guilds under the jurisdiction of the corporation of London and conferring on their members franchises as freemen of the city of London. None of these predecessors could, I think, have claimed that their non-charitable activities were merely ancillary to a main object which was charitable. The last of such predecessors is, however, stated in the recitals to have been dissolved, and, although under the operative part of the charter its privileges and properties are confirmed to the college, it is expressly provided that the corporation of London is to have no jurisdiction over the college nor are the members of the college to be freemen of the city of London.

It is, therefore, argued that the college is not in any sense a trade guild. On the other hand, it is to be observed that the master, governors and court of assistants are given power to make bye-laws for the regulation, government and advantage of the college and that the master, governors and assistants are obliged to take an oath to maintain the honour and the welfare of the college. The master, governors and court of assistants are further empowered to transact or ordain all such other matters and things as the master, governors and court of assistants of the late dissolved company or corporation might theretofore lawfully do, transact or ordain. Counsel for the college argued that this last power was purely administrative and was confined to doing such things as were requisite for the achievement of the charitable objects referred to in the last two recitals in the charter. In considering the validity of this argument it is, I think, permissible to look at the bye-laws which in fact the college adopted. They are set out in the calendar. Bye-law 15 reads as follows:

"The council will, at all times, protect and defend every fellow, fellow in dental surgery, member, and licentiate in dental surgery of the college in the exercise and enjoyment of the rights and privileges acquired by him as a diplomate of the college."

Bye-law 16 gives power to remove from fellowship or membership a fellow or member who is adjudged guilty of professional misconduct or is convicted of a criminal offence or has his name removed from the medical register of the General Medical Council under s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858. Section 16, at any rate, cannot have existed in its present form at the time of the charter of 1800 or, indeed, at any date before the passing of the Medical Act, 1858, but it was not suggested that some disciplinary powers were not at all times contained in the bye-laws or that some provision had not always been made enabling the council to defend its fellows and members. Counsel for the college sought to explain these provisions on the grounds indicated in para. 22 and para. 23 of Lord Webb-Johnson's affidavit, where he says:

"22. Apart from examinations the college seeks and has sought in the interests of the public to do all it can to secure that surgical practitioners shall not only be technically competent but also shall hold to high standards of professional honour. As a corollary the college feels and has felt itself bound to take and retain powers to defend and protect in their professional capacity its fellows, members and licentiates, but this not in their interest but in the interest of the public so that surgeons feeling that they enjoy the support of the college may fearlessly and without anxiety render their best professional services to their patients. 23. As for disciplinary measures the council preserve their powers under the charters and bye-laws, but in practice the discipline of registered medical practitioners is now for the most part maintained by the General Medical Council established by the Medical Act, 1858."

In the light of this evidence, I am unable to reach a conclusion that the disciplinary and "defence" activities of the college are purely ancillary to its plainly charitable objects as set out in the recitals and illustrated in its report of 1948. It was the descendant of a body which plainly could not be regarded as a purely charitable corporation. If it had not had disciplinary powers over its members, there was, until the Medical Act, 1858, so far as the evidence goes, no other body which could exercise those powers over its members. Having regard to no. 15 of the bye-laws and to para. 22 of Lord Webb-Johnson's affidavit, it is difficult to accept the view that the power to defend and protect in their professional capacity its fellows, members and licentiates was taken in 1800 solely in the interests of the public and without any intention to promote the interests of the college. On the whole, therefore, though with some reluctance, having regard to the excellent work in research and education that the college is now doing, I have come to the conclusion that the college cannot properly be held to have established that its objects in so far as they are non-charitable are merely ancillary to a main charitable object. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Wilde, Sapte & Co. (for the Royal College of Surgeons); Withers & Co. (for the executors and trustees of the will); Peake & Co. (for the Council of the Middlesex Hospital Medical School).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

A. SMITH & SON (BOGNOR REGIS), LTD. v. WALKER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), March 24, 25, 1952.]

Building Control—Licence—Licensed and unlicensed work carried out—Allocation of payments to licensed work—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927, as amended by S.R. & O., 1945, No. 502), reg. 56A (2).

By an agreement dated Apr. 20, 1948, the plaintiffs, a firm of building contractors, agreed to carry out certain demolition and building works on the defendant's house. Before a building licence, as required by reg. 56A (2) of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, had been obtained the plaintiffs pulled down a wall of the house and re-built it, and on Apr. 23, and June 11, 1948, the defendant paid to the plaintiffs two sums of £500. On June 11 and 30, 1948, the plaintiffs obtained licences in respect of work on the rest of the house authorising an expenditure of £3,200. The cost of the unlicensed work amounted to some £1,700. In a claim by the plaintiffs for the balance of the payments in respect of the work carried out,

HELD: the payments by the defendant should be allocated in respect of the sums which the plaintiffs could lawfully claim, and, therefore, should be allocated to the licensed work.

FOR THE DEFENCE (GENERAL) REGULATIONS, 1939, reg. 56A (2), see BUTTERWORTHS COMMERCIAL CONTROLS, Vol. 1, p. 104.

Cases referred to:

(1) Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn, [1949] 1 All E.R. 616; [1949] 2 K.B. 327; [1949] L.J.R. 857; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Howell v. Falmouth Boat Construction, Ltd., [1951] 2 All E.R. 278; [1951] A.C. 837.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of MORRIS, J., dated May 4, 1951.

The plaintiffs were building contractors and registered builders. The defendant was the owner of premises at 3, Mill Lane, Arundel, Sussex. The plaintiffs claimed from the defendant £2,358 12s. 6d., and £233 5s. 1d., balances alleged to be due for work done and materials supplied under an agreement dated Apr. 20, 1948, in respect of building operations at the defendant's premises, and damages for fraud. The plaintiffs alleged that they had been induced to enter into the agreement for the work carried out by a representation by the defendant that a building licence had been obtained in respect of the work, except for the demolition and re-building of a wall of the premises which, the plaintiffs claimed, was an emergency operation not requiring a licence. On Apr. 22, 1948, the plaintiffs started to carry out the demolition and re-building of the wall which finally cost £1,733 5s. 1d. On Apr. 23, and June 11, 1948, the defendant paid to the plaintiffs £500 which sums were acknowledged respectively as being "for demolition of faulty structure" and "on account of work carried out". On June 11 and 30, 1948, licences authorising operations on the premises, but not including the work on the wall, at a cost not exceeding £3,200 were obtained by the plaintiffs. On Aug. 9, 1948, the defendant paid a further sum of £500. The plaintiffs claimed that the £1,500 paid by the defendant should be allocated towards the cost of the work carried out on the wall, leaving a balance of £233 5s. 1d. They further claimed that the cost of work up to £3,200 covered by the licences was recoverable from the defendant, giving credit only for payments of £500 and £341 made by the defendant in November, 1948. MORRIS, J., held that the defendant was not guilty of fraud, that the works carried out before June 11 were not emergency operations and required a licence, and that the first two payments made by the defendant were in respect of the unlicensed work and could not be allocated to the licensed work, and, taking into consideration the further payments made by the defendant after June 11, he gave judgment for £1,858 12s. 6d.

The defendant appeared in person.

G. R. F. Morris for the plaintiffs.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of MORRIS, J., under which he ordered that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs for £1,858 12s. 6d. alleged to be due under a building contract. The original contract, which was later replaced by another contract on a different basis, was contained in a document dated Apr. 20, 1948, addressed by the plaintiffs to the defendant as follows:

"We agree to carry out the demolition and building works of No. 3 Mill Lane, Arundel, Sussex, according to the plan handed to us, and passed by the Borough of Arundel Council 12/2/48, with the exception that the west elevation wall shall be demolished and re-built in 11 inch cavity brick-work for the sum of £2,500. Any alterations or deviation during the progress of the work shall be mutually agreed by estimate before any alterations or deviations are commenced. We undertake to commence the work tomorrow, Wednesday, Apr. 21 as arranged. We also agree to expedite in every possible way the completion of the contract. Methods of payments required:—£500 immediate payment. Further payments at intervals of twenty-eight days to be agreed mutually. We will set a target of completion in ten weeks, and shall do our utmost to beat this."

The work cost more than was estimated originally and there was a substituted contract on a cost-plus percentage basis.

The feature of the matter with which we are chiefly concerned is this. The work required a building licence, and one of the issues before the learned judge was an allegation of fraud by the plaintiffs against the defendant in that he had orally represented to them that he had lawfully obtained a licence for the demolition and building works other than the demolition and re-building of the west elevation wall and that such licence had been issued authorising the operations to be carried out at a cost not exceeding £2,500. That allegation of fraud failed before the learned judge. The position was that the defendant had taken steps towards obtaining a licence, and, as the plans had been passed by the Arundel council, it may well have been assumed that a licence would be forthcoming in respect of the work other than the demolition of the west elevation wall. When the plaintiffs started work, as they did on Apr. 21, they had no licence for the demolition of the west elevation wall, and there never was a licence for the demolition of that wall. It was sought to be said before the learned judge that this was emergency work, and that, having regard to the provisions of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A (6), proviso (b), it did not require a licence. The learned judge found against that contention, and, I should have thought, rightly. The appeal has proceeded on the basis that this was work which required to be licensed.

The main point on this appeal is illustrated by the following example. If one takes a case where there is a lump sum contract for work for, say, £4,000, and payments are made under provisions such as the present from time to time, but not of the full amount—say, £2,500—and when the contractor sues for the balance it turns out that £1,000 worth of the work ought to have been, but was not, licensed, on principles which have been laid down by this court in Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn (1) and by the House of Lords in Howell v. Falmouth Boat Construction, Ltd. (2), the contractor cannot recover more than £3,000. I think that in those circumstances the defendant would be entitled to say that the £2,500 which he had paid by instalments under general words such as those in this contract should be allocated as against the £3,000 which he was legally bound to pay. The plaintiffs here seek to say that the first payment of £500 and a subsequent payments of the same amount should be allocated to the work which has turned out to be illegal. If one isolates the work on the western elevation wall, assuming that there had been a separate contract for it and that there had been no payment, the plaintiffs could not recover in respect of that work. On the other hand, if payments had been made in respect of unlicensed work, it seems to me that the payer could not recover them back. If these first payments are to be treated as appropriated or allocated to the illegal work, they could not be recovered back and would not be available to be credited against the legal, licensed work. That is the view which the learned judge has taken and the question is whether he was right. I took a simpler case than the present one under which I think the contention put forward by the defendant, that the payments made must be allocated against the legal work, would have succeeded. The question is whether there are matters here which differentiate this case from that case? Having listened to counsel for the plaintiffs, I think this is a question of law on the documents and on the admitted facts. The admitted facts are that the first work done was the unlicensed work and at the time when these payments were made, that was the only work which had been done. Is that enough?

The learned judge based his judgment largely, if not wholly, on the wording of the receipts, given by the plaintiffs for the first two payments. He said:

“ Certain payments were made to the plaintiffs. Page 3 of the correspondence shows that £500 was received from the defendant, and it is described as ‘ for demolition of faulty structure at 3 Mill Lane, Arundel ’. The letter on p. 5 of the correspondence records that a further £500 was acknowledged on June 15: ‘ We thank you for your cheque value £500 on account of work carried out at the above ’. The defendant’s pleading, in para. 18, is that those two cheques were dated respectively Apr. 23 and June 11. The letter I have just read speaks of ‘ work carried out ’. Before June 11 there was no licence in existence, and the works that had been carried out before the licence was in existence were works that were unlawful, having regard to reg. 56A (2); but payment was in fact made by the defendant of those two amounts. The next payment that was made was [on Aug. 9] . . . The defendant, by para. 19 of the defence, has pleaded as follows: ‘ Further, if (which is denied) the plaintiffs carried out work upon the said site exceeding in cost £3,200, the same was illegal, not being licensed pursuant to reg. 56A of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 ’. Even if the defendant had not taken that point before the matter came into court, the court would have to take the point. The position, therefore, is that any works that are unlawful under reg. 56A (2), could not be made the subject of a claim. What the defendant says is: ‘ There were only, in total, licences for £3,200. I have paid four sums of £500 and I am entitled to credits as well ’. The defendant is, therefore, seeking to say that the payment that he made by cheque on Apr. 23 is a payment that he can allocate in respect of the work that was licensed, the £3,200. It was put by [counsel for the defendant] that the first £500 was merely a payment as contemplated by the contract . . . but that was a payment for the work done, and the plaintiffs, in

- A para. 10 of the statement of claim, have said that the payments were 'expressly appropriated by the plaintiffs to and in respect of and on account of the work specified in para. 8, being the emergency operations carried out at the request of the defendant and pursuant to the direction and/or authority of the said Simmonds acting for and on behalf of the Arundel Town Council'. Those latter words were struck out in the amended statement of claim. I have held that the plaintiffs are wrong in saying that those were emergency operations, but one must nevertheless see what were the facts, and it seems to me that the first payment, made by cheque on Apr. 23 and acknowledged on Apr. 30, was a cheque as recorded on p. 3, [in] payment 'for demolition of faulty structure', and no licence was in existence at that time; no licence was ever in existence to demolish the rear wall. That payment was then made for the work done, but it does not seem to me that the defendant can say that he seeks, in spite of the facts, to take that payment away from that date and relate it to the later period. The same applies, in my judgment, to . . . the cheque for £500 paid on June 11 and acknowledged on June 15, the plaintiffs saying: 'We thank you for your cheque value £500 on account of work carried out at the above'."
- B
- C I feel a difficulty about that decision. It seems to me that as a matter of law the nature of these payments must be sought in the contract under which they were made. The fact that words are put in the receipt which might indicate an intention to appropriate does not seem to me to be enough to deprive the payment of the character it had derived from the contract unless, of course—and this is not suggested—there had been some verbal or written agreement between the parties to that effect. The mere fact that the defendant did not object to the words on the receipt does not seem to me to be enough. All he was interested in was getting a receipt. It is to be noted that the receipts were sent some time after the payments, and, at any rate so far as the first payment is concerned, that was made practically before work was started. With regard to periodical payments which are made under contracts of this kind, in the absence of express
- D provision in the contract, there is nothing to restrict their use to the work actually in operation. They can be used for the purchase of materials required for future operations. Therefore, I do not think that the wording of the receipt is sufficient to enable the plaintiffs to say that these payments should not be treated as payments generally on account of the contract, nor do I think that it is sufficient to enable them to say that the work being done at that time was not only un-
- E licensed work, but work for which a licence was never obtained. We are only concerned here to apply the law, but I think that the plaintiffs (who after all were builders and should be familiar to some extent with the licensing provisions) had only themselves to blame if they took the view that all this work could be done without a licence as emergency work. I think the defendant is right in saying that these payments must be treated as payments under the contract as a whole and must be allocated to his credit in respect of such a sum
- F as the plaintiffs can lawfully claim from him. To that extent, in my view, the appeal should be allowed.
- G

H DENNING, L.J.: Builders, when they undertake building work, ought to see the licence before they start the work. It is no good their relying on the word of the owner that he has got a licence, because, if it should turn out that he has got none, the work will be illegal and they will be unable to recover payment for it: Dennis & Co., Ltd. v. Munn (1). They can charge him with fraud, but that is a very serious charge to make and very likely to fail. The builder usually makes himself responsible for getting the licence and does not, in fact, rely on the owner.

In the present case the builders pulled down a wall and re-built it without a licence. They then got licences for altering the rest of the house at a cost not to exceed £3,200. They now want to get payment not only of the £3,200 for the licensed work, but also of some £1,700 for the cost of the unlicensed work. They sought to say that it was emergency work which did not need a licence. They failed on that point. They next sought to say that the owner assured them he had got a licence for it and that he had been guilty of fraud. They failed on that point also. Defeated on those two points, they then said that in the early days of the contract, while only the unlicensed work was being done, the defendant had paid them two sums of £500 and they claimed to appropriate these sums to the unlicensed work. They succeeded before the judge on that point. This means that they have got payment, not only of the £3,200 for the licensed work, but also of £1,000 for the unlicensed work. The important question in this case is: How far can a builder appropriate payments to unlicensed work?

Take, first, a case where all the work done was unlicensed, and part payments have been made. In such a case the builder cannot successfully claim the balance due to him and the owner cannot recover any payments that he has made. Both were parties to an illegal transaction and the law will not give its help to either of them. Take, now, a case where one part of the work is unlicensed and the other part is licensed. In such a case I think it plain that any payments made by the owner generally on account of the work must be allocated to the lawful part of it. It is not permissible for the builder to appropriate them to the unlawful part, but, if the owner himself specifically appropriates a particular payment to the unlawful part, then it remains where it is. He cannot turn round afterwards and appropriate it to the lawful part. Just as the builder cannot recover the balance due to him for the unlawful part, so also the owner cannot recover back any payments he has made specifically on account of it. He cannot do it directly by action, nor can he do it indirectly by altering his appropriation from the unlawful to the lawful part.

In these circumstances the sole question in the case is: Were these two sums of £500 paid generally on account or were they paid specifically in respect of the unlawful work? On the facts found by the judge, I think they were made generally on account. They were not appropriated by the owner to any particular work. At the time the builder sought to appropriate them to the unlawful part. That he cannot be allowed to do. It is true that the owner made no objection, but that does not matter. The builder knows, or ought to know, the position about the licences better than the owner, and he cannot be allowed to circumvent it by appropriating the payments to the unlawful parts, no matter at what stage he does it. Nothing less than a specific appropriation by the owner will suffice. I agree with my Lord, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed to that extent.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Pritchard, Englefield & Co., agents for Chamberlain, Martin & Spurgeon, Bognor Regis (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

WATTS v. ENFIELD ROLLING MILLS (ALUMINIUM), LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), February 27, 1952.]

Factory—Protection of eyes—Obligation to provide goggles—"Cutting off of bolts from boilers or other plant"—"Plant"—Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938 (S.R. & O., 1938, No. 654), schedule.

A Factory—Statutory duty—Breach—Onus of proof—Injury to workman.

A workman, who was employed as an aircraft stripper in a factory, was engaged with other workmen in dismantling an aircraft engine by breaking off its bolts. While this work was being done, bolts sometimes flew up from the engine against the wall or to the roof. The workman was injured, and, as a result, lost an eye, but it was not certain how the accident happened. In an action against his employers alleging, inter alia, a breach by them of their statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 49, and the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, in that they had failed to supply him with goggles while he was "cutting out or cutting off bolts from plant", the workman claimed that his injury must have been caused by a flying bolt and he contended that the court should draw the inference that it was so caused. The employers called evidence to show that the injury might have been caused by the workman hitting his eye against a rod which was in a vertical position near to him at the time of the accident. The trial judge declined to draw the inference that the injury was due to a flying bolt. On an appeal by the workman,

D HELD: (i) "plant" in the phrase "cutting out or cutting off... of... bolts from boilers or other plant" in the schedule to the regulations was not restricted to the plant of the occupier of the premises where the cutting off of the bolts was being done, but meant any object of a general kind which was riveted or bolted and from which bolts could be cut out or cut off, and, therefore, the aircraft engine which was being dismantled was "plant" within the meaning of the schedule.

E (ii) in a claim for damages for breach of a statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, the onus was on the workman to show, first, that the injury was caused by the danger against which the legislature intended to guard him (in this case, the flying bolt), and, after that was proved, the onus was then on him to show that there was a breach of the statutory duty which was intended to guard against that danger; only after both these matters had been proved or admitted was the onus on the employers to show that their breach of statutory duty was not the cause of the workman's injury; and, therefore, as the workman had failed to satisfy the judge that the cause of his injury was the flying bolt, he had not proved the first requisite, and his claim failed.

G FOR THE FACTORIES ACT, 1937, s. 49, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, p. 1039.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Yarmouth v. France, (1887), 19 Q.B.D. 647; 57 L.J.Q.B. 7; 34 Digest 225, 1884.
- (2) Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd., [1945] 2 All E.R. 547; [1946] K.B. 50; 115 L.J.K.B. 119; 173 L.T. 330; 110 J.P. 76; 2nd Digest Supp.
- H (3) Mist v. Toleman & Sons, [1946] 1 All E.R. 139; 110 J.P. 149; 38 B.W.C.C. 150; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 387; 172 L.T. 285; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Stimson v. Standard Telephones & Cables, Ltd., [1939] 4 All E.R. 225; 161 L.T. 387; sub nom. Stimpson v. Standard Telephones & Cables, Ltd., [1940] 1 K.B. 342; 109 L.J.K.B. 315; 32 B.W.C.C. 253; 2nd Digest Supp.

- (6) Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd., [1939] 3 All E.R. 722; [1940] A.C. 152; 108 L.J.K.B. 779; 161 L.T. 374; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Smithwick v. National Coal Board, [1950] 2 K.B. 335; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of ORMEROD, J., dated Nov. 16, 1951, dismissing an action for damages for personal injuries.

The plaintiff, an aircraft stripper employed by the defendants, lost an eye as a result of an accident while he was engaged in dismantling an aircraft engine. A He claimed that the injury must have been caused by a flying bolt, and that, on the evidence, the court should draw the inference that the injury was so caused, and he contended that the defendants were liable to him in damages (a) in that they had failed to provide him with goggles in breach of their statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 49, and the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, and (b) for breach of their common law duty. B ORMEROD, J., held that the aircraft engine was not "plant" within the meaning of the schedule to the regulations of 1938, and he was not satisfied, on the evidence, that a flying bolt was the cause of the injury.

Beney, Q.C., and Pickles for the plaintiff.

Berryman, Q.C., and Stanley-Price for the defendants. C

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of ORMEROD, J., in a claim for damages for personal injuries which resulted, unhappily, in the plaintiff losing his left eye. The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as an aircraft stripper. With others, he was engaged in breaking up or dismantling an engine, the object being to get the aluminium which was in it. In some cases, particularly if the engine has been under cover and comes straight from where it has been used, the dismantling is done by unscrewing the bolts with spanners. On the other hand, a number of these engines have been in the open air, or not used for some time, and the bolts are rusted up. In those circumstances the nuts or bolts are broken off by means of a hammer and a cold chisel, and, when they are broken off, from time to time they fly from the engine up against the wall and sometimes up to the roof. The accident happened in this way. While the plaintiff was engaged on this work, part of an engine, the supercharger, had come down to his rig (a sort of iron framework on which the engine rested) and had been placed on the floor. He was quite near it and was stooping down to pick up his hammer and chisel, which were on the floor. According to what he himself remembered (and there is no doubt about the main facts of the accident), as he stooped down or, according to other witnesses, just as he was about to rise, he cried out, having felt a blow on his eye. When his fellow workmen came up, his eye was on the side of his cheek. He was taken to hospital and lost the eye. D E F

The plaintiff claimed that the accident was due (i) to a breach by the defendants of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 49, and the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, made under s. 49 of the Act, and (ii) to a breach by the defendants of their common law duty. His case was that the injury was caused by a bolt which had been chiselled off by one of the men working in the factory. He contended that a flying bolt must have been the cause of the injury, and that the court should draw the inference that it was. The defendants, on the other hand, called evidence, which was accepted by the judge, that, at the time when the accident happened, a tube, which was part of a supercharger, was on the ground by the plaintiff. Normally, it would be lying horizontally and would not be a danger to anybody stooping down, but at the time of the accident, it was in a vertical position. The defendants suggested that the plaintiff, as he stooped, did not see the upright tube and inadvertently put his eye against it, and that was the cause of the accident. There was only one man chiselling bolts in the shop at the time of the accident. He was working with his back to the plaintiff and at a distance of some thirty to forty-five feet from him. If the plaintiff G H had been hit by a bolt, it would have been a bolt from the machine on which this man was working. The bolt would have hit the wall in front of him and then come back, possibly going up to the ceiling, as sometimes happened, and ricocheted back and hit the plaintiff's eye. The learned judge came to the conclusion that he was "far from being satisfied" that the accident was caused by such a flying bolt. He said:

- A "Before I can find that the plaintiff's unfortunate accident was the result of being struck by a piece of flying metal, I must be satisfied on the evidence that I should draw that inference, and, for the reasons which I have given, I can only say that on this evidence I am very far from being satisfied that that is the case."
- B He did not find affirmatively, nor was it necessary, I think, for him to do so, that the accident was due to the plaintiff's eye coming in contact with the tube. In regard to the plaintiff's claim under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 49, and the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938, the learned judge decided that this work was not within the regulations. Section 49 of the Act of 1937, under which the regulations were made, provides:
- C "In the case of any such process as may be specified by regulations of the Secretary of State, being a process which involves a special risk of injury to the eyes from particles or fragments thrown off in the course of the process, suitable goggles or effective screens shall, in accordance with any directions given by the regulations, be provided to protect the eyes of the persons employed in the process."
- D The plaintiff's case was that goggles were not provided and that, if they had been, the injury from the flying bolt would not have occurred. The processes in the case of which s. 49 is to apply are specified in the schedule to the regulations of 1938, and the relevant words of the schedule are:
- E "Cutting out or cutting off . . . of cold rivets or bolts from boilers or other plant or from ships."
- The learned judge held that these engines were not within those words, and his decision must involve that they were not covered by the words "other plant". The word "plant", I think, is one of those words the meaning of which, in its ordinary significance, is very wide. It may be cut down by its context. In certain contexts in the Factories Acts I think it means plant used by the occupier of the factory for the purposes of the processes he carries on there. In Yarmouth v. France (1) it was held that a horse used by a wharfinger was "plant" within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 1 (1). I think that in this context "plant" means any object of a general kind which is riveted or bolted and from which, therefore, cold rivets or bolts may be cut out or cut off. I cannot accept the suggestion that "plant", within the meaning of the regulation, is restricted to the plant of the occupier of the premises where the cutting off of the bolts or rivets is being done, and, therefore, would not cover objects such as engines brought in to be dismantled. In these matters one must, I think, apply ordinary principles to the meaning of words, and the purpose which s. 49 of the Act of 1937 and the regulations of 1938 are intended to cover is the process of removing bolts and is not concerned with the past or present history of the object
- H from which the bolts are being cut out or cut off. I, therefore, would have come to the conclusion that these engines were "plant" within the schedule to the regulations of 1938.
- On that view counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the learned judge had misdirected himself because he had regarded the onus as remaining on the plaintiff to satisfy him that the accident was caused by a flying bolt, and he contended that, having regard to what was said in this court in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (2), that was wrong. In Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (2) the plaintiff's left hand was injured when he was working at a circular saw. It was common ground that the injury had been caused by the circular saw. A breach of the Factories Act with regard to circular saws was alleged and proved, but it was suggested that the injury was not caused by the employers' breach. It was in connection with those facts that SCOTT, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 549):

"If there is a definite breach of a safety provision imposed on the occupier of a factory, and a workman is injured in a way which could result from the breach, the onus of proof shifts on to the employer to show that the breach was not the cause. We think that that principle lies at the very basis of statutory rules of absolute duty."

Those words (and I would emphasise the word "could" in the first sentence of the passage which I have quoted) might well be regarded as bringing this case within Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (2), but MACKINNON, L.J., who was a party to that decision, referred to it in Mist v. Toleman & Sons (3), in which it was suggested that tuberculosis had developed in the plaintiff as a result of a breach of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 47 (1). After referring to what was said in the judgment of the court in Vyner's case (2), MACKINNON, L.J., went on to say ([1946] 1 All E.R. 142):

"Tuberculosis, however, is not the very thing that s. 47 (1) is designed to guard against or to prevent. The object of s. 47 (1) is to provide against every possible uncomfortable, offensive or injurious effect due to the presence of dust. Tuberculosis is not the very class of injury which, and which alone, is contemplated as the danger to be guarded against by this section for the removal of dust. The dust is a factor which may cause coughing, which coughing may be one of the many things which may activate a quiescent tuberculosis. But I think it is quite wrong to transfer the words of SCOTT, L.J., in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (2), and similarly the words of GODDARD, L.J., in Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd. (4), directed as they were to that particular rule about fencing a circular saw, so as to lay down a general proposition as regards any section in the Factories Act, with the result that, where any breach of the Factories Act is proved and that breach may be one of the causes which brought about the subsequent injury to the workman, the onus is then cast upon the employer to show that it did not do so. In my opinion, therefore, the onus of disproving the possibility that this presence of dust may have been a cause contributing to or activating the tubercular condition of the plaintiff was not cast upon the defendants, but remained with the plaintiff . . ."

I think that that application, or restriction, of what was said in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (2) is in accordance with what was said in the earlier decision of this court in Stimson v. Standard Telephones & Cables, Ltd. (5), where SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., basing himself on a passage from the opinion of LORD MACMILLAN ([1939] 3 All E.R. 732) in Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (6), adopted an example which had been put by MACKINNON, L.J., in the course of the argument in Stimson's case (5). SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said ([1939] 4 All E.R. 229):

"... it would not be sufficient to show that a workman was found in the neighbourhood of a dangerous machine unconscious, with a wound upon him which might have been caused by the dangerous part of the machine, or might have been caused in some other way by the use of, for instance, a hand tool which the workman had to use. If that were all that appeared, then, it would not be shown—although the breach of statutory duty would be established owing to the failure to fence the machine—that that accident was causally associated with the breach of the statutory duty, because the facts would be equally consistent with its having been due to some other cause."

Taking that example, one can, I think, illustrate from it the limitation of the general words used in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (2). If the workman, instead of being simply “ . . . found in the neighbourhood of a dangerous machine unconscious, with a wound upon him which might have been caused by the dangerous part of the machine . . . ”

A had been found in circumstances in which the occupiers accepted that the wound was caused by the dangerous part of the machine, then the principle as stated in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (2) would have been applicable. In the present case I think that, whether one treats the failure to supply goggles as a breach of s. 49 of the Act of 1937 and the regulations of 1938, or as a breach of the duty at common law, the onus remains on the plaintiff to satisfy the learned judge that the cause of his injury was a flying bolt. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and continued:] It was for the learned judge to weigh the evidence, and as, in my opinion, he did not misdirect himself, I do not think this court can interfere with his decision.

C DENNING, L.J.: I agree with all that SOMERVELL, L.J., has said about the meaning of the word “plant” in the schedule to the regulations of 1938. I only wish to add a word on the question of the burden of proof under the Factories Act, which has often given rise to difficulty. The first burden which is always on the plaintiff is this. He must show that his injury was caused by the relevant danger, i.e., by the danger against which Parliament intended to guard him, such as a circular saw, a flying fragment, a revolving belt, or such like. That appears from Stimson's case (5), Mist v. Toleman & Sons (3) and Smithwick v. National Coal Board (7). When that is proved or admitted, then the second thing which the plaintiff must show is that there was a breach of a statutory duty which was intended to guard against that very danger. When both those matters are proved, the proper inference is that the breach was the cause of the injury unless the occupier of the factory proves that it was not: see Lee v. Nursery Furnishings, Ltd. (4) and Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (2).

E In the present case, the relevant danger was a flying fragment. At the outset, therefore, the plaintiff had to show that the injury to his eye was caused by a flying fragment. The defendants denied this. They said it was caused by a standing rod which was not a relevant danger, i.e., not a danger against which there was any statutory duty to guard the plaintiff. They suggested that he F put his head down and ran his eye into a standing rod. The decision on that point was a matter of inference from the evidence. The judge declined to draw the inference that the injury was due to a flying fragment. That means that the plaintiff did not prove the first requisite. He did not prove that his injury was caused by the relevant danger. He did not, therefore, get to the point where he could put the burden on the occupiers of the factory. In the circumstances, G it seems to me that there is no ground on which this court can interfere with the decision of the learned judge below. The appropriate remedy of the workman is not damages but industrial assurance. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

H ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. I only desire to intimate my express concurrence in the interpretation that SOMERVELL, L.J., has put on the word “plant” in the schedule to the Protection of Eyes Regulations, 1938.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Ward, Bowie & Co., agents for James A. Lee & Priestley, Bradford (for the plaintiff); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for A. V. Hammond & Co., Bradford (for the defendants).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BROWN v. BROWN.Followed. FROST v. FROST, [1
2 All E.R. 1125.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), March 21, 1952.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Taxation—No order made as to costs—Need of order for taxation—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), sched. III, para. 4 (1)—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 18 (3).

A wife, an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, petitioned for a decree of divorce on the ground of her husband's desertion. She asked for the exercise of the court's discretion in her favour, and the commissioner exercised his discretion in her favour and granted her a decree. Being of the opinion that the wife had not been frank in her discretion statement, he made no order as to costs and refused to order taxation of the wife's costs as between solicitor and client in accordance with the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, sched. III, para. 4 (1), thus depriving her solicitors of their right to be paid out of the legal aid fund.

HELD: the court had power to make an order for the taxation of an assisted person's costs, notwithstanding that no other order as to costs was made, and in the circumstances of the present case an order should be made.

Per BIRKETT, L.J.: the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 18 (3), imperatively directed that an order for taxation of an assisted person's costs should be made.

FOR THE LEGAL AID AND ADVICE ACT, 1949, s. 6, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 18, p. 540.

Case referred to:

(1) Lonnkvist v. Lonnkvist, [1952] W.N. 88.

APPEAL by the wife (petitioner in a divorce suit) from a refusal of His Honour JUDGE BATT sitting as a divorce commissioner to order taxation of her costs as an assisted person.

I. S. Webster for the wife.

The husband did not appear.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This point is not free from difficulty, having regard to the wording of reg. 18 (3) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, made under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.

The petitioner, Gladys Brown, was an assisted person. The legal aid certificate is dated Aug. 2, 1951, and her petition for a decree dissolving her marriage on the ground of her husband's desertion was heard by His Honour JUDGE BATT sitting as commissioner at Manchester on Nov. 27, 1951. The wife asked for the exercise of the discretion of the court in her favour. The learned commissioner heard the evidence of the husband, and he came to the conclusion that the wife had been far from frank in her discretion statement. If he had thought right, he could have adjourned the hearing and reported the matter to the Law Society so that the appropriate committee of the Law Society could move to set aside the legal aid certificate which had been granted to the wife or he could have refused to grant her a decree of divorce. He did neither of those things. He heard the petition to its end, and he then exercised his discretion in the wife's favour and granted her a decree.

Thereafter a question arose as to costs. Counsel for the wife was about to raise the matter when the learned commissioner said:

"I do not propose to make an order for taxation here. This woman will have to meet this obligation with her solicitors. Obviously there has been suppression here. The only way to deal with this case, to see that in future solicitors are very careful in these matters, is to refuse to make an order for these costs to be taxed under the fund. I do not make the order. The solicitors instructing you will have to refer to their own methods to get the costs out of this woman."

Then he said to the husband:

"I have granted a decree. You will not have to pay any costs", for which the husband expressed his thanks.

A Some little time later counsel applied to the learned commissioner again on the question of costs, asking that he should make an order, and he referred the commissioner to reg. 18 (3) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, which is in this form:

B "Any order for the payment of the costs of any proceedings to which an assisted person is a party shall include a direction that his costs are (in addition to any other direction as to taxation contained in the order) to be taxed as between solicitor and client in accordance with the provisions of sched. III to the Act."

C The learned commissioner pointed out to counsel that he had not made an order for the payment of costs and so no question under that regulation arose, and on one reading of the order that may be said to be right. The usual form of order was altered and the printed words which appear on the order "and condemn the respondent in costs incurred . . ." were struck out, so that on the face of the order there was no order for the payment of costs.

D The difficulty I felt at one time was whether in those circumstances it was open to this court to interfere with the order at all. Counsel for the wife, or for her solicitors, submits that when the commissioner said: "I do not propose to make an order for taxation here", and, later (to the husband): "You will not have to pay any costs", that was an order in regard to costs and is to be covered by the words "any order for the payment of the costs." I am a little doubtful whether that argument is sound, though I think there is something to be said for it.

E It must be remembered that the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, was passed to secure that those who could not afford to pay the costs of litigation should have legal aid in cases which were regarded by the appropriate committee as proper cases for that aid. Section 6 (1) of the Act provides:

F "Panels of solicitors and barristers willing to act for persons receiving legal aid shall be prepared and maintained, and there may be separate panels for different purposes, for different courts and for different districts."

G If solicitors undertake a duty under that section so that they become members of a panel for the area concerned, I suppose that, prima facie, when they are asked by a client to undertake a case in that area, they are bound to do so. At least, the committee would expect them to show good reason if they declined. If they become members of a panel under s. 6 (1), the later parts of the section apply to them. Sub-section (5) is in these terms:

"Subject to this Part of this Act, a solicitor who has acted for a person receiving legal aid shall be paid for so acting out of the legal aid fund, and any fees paid to counsel for so acting shall also be paid out of that fund."

H So, solicitors accepting the retainer of an assisted person under that section do so on the terms that, under sub-s. (5), they are entitled to payment for their services. Section 6 (6) of the Act provides:

"The sums payable under the last foregoing sub-section to a solicitor or counsel shall not exceed those allowed under sched. III to this Act."

The legal aid fund, which is administered by the Law Society, is available in the ordinary course to meet disbursements for solicitors or counsel and others. Schedule III to the Act provides in para. 2 what the payment to solicitors and counsel shall be, and it is pointed out that, if the order of His Honour JUDGE

BATT stands, those who have accepted duties under the Act are deprived of the pay or remuneration—and even of repayment in respect of the disbursements which they have incurred—which they were entitled to receive under the Act, for the sums allowed to counsel and to solicitors are, under sched. III, dependent on taxation.

The learned counsel referred us also to reg. 12 of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, which deals with the effect of the discharge and revocation of certificates. Regulation 12 (3) provides:

“Upon determination of a retainer under this regulation—(a) the costs of the proceedings to which the certificate related, incurred by or on behalf of the person to whom it was issued, shall, as soon as practicable thereafter, be taxed or, as the case may be, assessed in accordance with the provisions of the Act and these regulations; (b) the fund shall remain liable for the payment of any costs so taxed or assessed.”

Thus, if it had been decided that the certificate should be revoked, the solicitors and counsel would have been paid, as provided. Again, the whole scheme of the Act and of the regulations under the Act is that those who perform duties under the Act shall be paid according to the terms of the Act. Unless there is an order for taxation, no one will tax the costs. The generally accepted practice under the assisted persons legislation has been that the order for the taxation of the assisted person's costs as between solicitor and client follows as of course. In Lonnkvist v. Lonnkvist (1) it would seem that the view of LORD MERRIMAN, P., was that the order could be made in a case in which an order for costs otherwise would not be made. It appears to me that the court ought to have power to do that in order to carry out the terms of the Act. If the court had no such power, the Act would fail, and those who had accepted retainers on behalf of assisted persons might find themselves without the remuneration which they were entitled to have under the Act.

The learned commissioner obviously thought that in the present case the wife ought not to have had legal aid. He said the solicitors might have found out that she had not given them full information. That is not always easy to find out, and if in such circumstances solicitors do not discover the true position, I do not think they ought necessarily to be deprived of all remuneration. If the wife was a person who ought to suffer for her lack of candour, there were ways of securing that. The failure to make the order which was sought in this case was no punishment of her. It merely placed difficulties on her advisers. I have formed the view that we ought to make the order which the commissioner would not make. I think we have power to do that, and, accordingly, in my opinion, there should be an order for the taxation of the assisted person's costs as between solicitor and client.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. I think that, if we do not make this order, we defeat the whole purpose of the Act, and, therefore, I think that the order certainly ought to be made. Section 6 of the Act lays down the scheme for panels of solicitors and counsel and deals with their remuneration, which is to come out of the legal aid fund, the amount of the remuneration being decided by reference to sched. III. It will be observed that that remuneration is wholly dependent on the taxation of the costs, and, therefore, unless an order for taxation is made, the whole scheme is defeated. Therefore, under reg. 18 (3) it is provided:

“Any order for the payment of the costs of any proceedings to which an assisted person is a party shall include a direction that his costs are (in addition to any other direction as to taxation contained in the order) to be taxed as between solicitor and client in accordance with the provisions of sched. III to the Act.”

That means, I think, that when the court is making an order as to costs, even though it is refusing to allow costs to the successful party, whatever else is done and whatever other direction is given, there is an imperative direction in order that the scheme should be carried out. For these reasons I agree with the judgment of SINGLETON, L.J.

A HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co., agents for Taylor & Buckley, Oldham (for the wife).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

B

COLIN & SHIELDS v. W. WEDDEL & CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), March 25, 26, April 1, 1952.]

C Shipping—"Ship's delivery order"—Request to ship to deliver goods to buyers—Order addressed by shipowner to dock master porter—Master porter not in possession of goods—Buyer's right to reject.

D A contract for the sale of goods and for their shipment to Liverpool provided that the buyers were to make payment for the goods against documents consisting of invoice, full set of bills of lading and/or ship's delivery order (to be countersigned by banker, shipowner, captain or mate if so required by the buyers), and policy or certificate of insurance. If a bill of lading was not supplied, the buyers were to be put in the same position as if they had been in possession of such documents. The goods were shipped to Manchester, and on Aug. 27, 1951, three days before their arrival there, the bill of lading was tendered to the buyers who rejected it on the ground that it was made out for delivery to Manchester. On Oct. 13 the goods were loaded on a dumb barge and carried to Liverpool where they were discharged on Oct. 17. On Oct. 15, while the goods were in transit, the sellers made a second tender of documents, not including a bill of lading, but including a document which they claimed to be a ship's delivery order, made out on the shipowner's notepaper and signed by the shipowners in the following form: "Oct. 11, 1951. Rio Grande Bill of Lading No. 7. To the master porter of the hide berth in the North Carriers Dock, Liverpool. Deliver to [the buyers] the following goods", followed by a description of the goods "ex ss. Devis". The buyers refused to accept the documents or make payment against them.

E HELD: (i) in the absence of a bill of lading for the carriage of the goods to Liverpool the sellers had failed to perform their obligation under the contract.

G (ii) assuming that the tender of a proper delivery order could overcome this omission, the document tendered to the buyers was not such an order, for, in view of the provision for countersigning, if so required, by "ship's delivery order" the contract contemplated a delivery order by the sellers to the ship requesting the ship to deliver to the buyers the goods shipped under the bill of lading, and it must be given and presented while the goods were in the ship's possession ;

H (iii) even if this were not the true construction of the contract, a ship's delivery order must be addressed to and accepted by someone who at the time was in physical possession of the goods and could attorn to the buyers;

(iv) as the document complied with neither of those requirements, it was not a ship's delivery order within the meaning of the contract and the buyers were entitled to refuse payment against it.

AS TO DELIVERY BY BILL OF LADING AND OTHER DOCUMENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 29, pp. 142-145, paras. 178-182; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 39, pp. 575-581, Nos. 1801-1839.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Johnson v. Taylor Brothers & Co., Ltd., [1920] A.C. 144; 89 L.J.K.B. 227; 122 L.T. 130; 39 Digest 660, 2515.
- (2) Comptoir D'Achat et de Vente du Boerenbond Belge S/A v. Luis de Ridder, Limitada (The Julia), [1949] 1 All E.R. 269; [1949] A.C. 293; [1949] L.J.R. 513; 2nd Digest Supp.

SPECIAL CASE stated by arbitrators.

By a contract dated June 12, 1951, the sellers, W. Weddel & Co., Ltd., sold to the buyers, Colin & Shields, one thousand wetsalted Anglo Pelotas frigorifico ox-hides at 34s. per pound, cost and freight, for shipment from Rio Grande to Liverpool by steamer and/or steamers within three months. Payment was to be by cash on presentation of shipping documents in London on or before arrival of the steamer at buyers' option, the documents to be invoice, bills of lading and/or ship's delivery order (the latter to be countersigned by banker, ship broker, captain, or mate, if so required), and policy or certificate of insurance. On July 31 the sellers made a declaration of shipment per ss. Devis for Liverpool. On Aug. 24 the sellers informed the buyers that the bill of lading had been wrongly made out by the shipping company, Lamport & Holt Line, Ltd., for delivery to Manchester. Later they informed the buyers that they had arranged with the shippers to add a clause to the bill of lading: "In transit to Liverpool". On Aug. 27 they tendered to the buyers documents which included the bill of lading. The buyers rejected the documents on the ground that the bill of lading was not made out for delivery to Liverpool, and they claimed arbitration. In their award the arbitrators held that the documents were not such as were called for by the contract and that the buyers were entitled to reject them. On Aug. 31 the ship reached Manchester via the Ship Canal, and on Sept. 7 she finished discharging her cargo there (including the one thousand ox-hides) and she left for Glasgow. The ox-hides remained in Manchester until Oct. 13, when they were loaded on a dumb barge which brought them to Liverpool and discharged them there on Oct. 17. On Oct. 15 the sellers made a second tender, of four documents described as shipping company's release signed by the shipowners, insurance certificate, specification, and invoice. The buyers rejected the documents. On a reference to arbitration, the arbitrators held that the documents tendered were as called for by the contract and that the buyers were not entitled to reject them. The buyers appealed to the committee of appeal of the Hide and Skin Shippers' and Agents' Association Incorporated. They conceded that the sellers were entitled to make a second tender of documents within the time limited by the contract, but contended that the tender was out of time because the sellers had not acted with reasonable expedition after they had shipped the goods. They also contended inter alia that the shipping company's release was not such a document as was contemplated by the contract as a "ship's delivery order", that the substitution of a ship's delivery order for a bill of lading implied a good bill of lading, and that the tender of a delivery order under a Manchester bill of lading was not good tender. The sellers submitted that it was customary to carry goods destined for Liverpool by dumb barge via the Ship Canal from Manchester and that the shipping company's release was a ship's delivery order (which the buyers had not chosen to require to be countersigned as they were entitled to require under the contract) and that the tender of it was good. At the request of the buyers the board of appeal stated its award in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the court. It found that the second tender of documents was in time, that it was customary to carry goods destined for Liverpool in the way stated by the sellers, and, subject to the opinion of the court, that the documents tendered were as called for by the contract and the buyers were not entitled to reject them. The question for the determination of the court was whether the buyers were in breach of the contract in refusing to make payment against the documents tendered by the sellers on Oct. 15, 1951.

Mocatta, Q.C., and H. A. P. Fisher for the buyers.

Scott Cairns, Q.C., and Nicklin for the sellers.

Cur. adv. vult.

- A Apr. 1. SELLERS, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, held that he was bound by the finding of fact in the award that the second tender of documents was in time, and continued: By cl. 3 of the contract the documents against which payment is to be made are to consist, of invoice, full set of bills of lading and/or ship's delivery order (the latter to be countersigned by banker, shipowner, captain or mate, if so required) and policy or certificate of insurance.
- B Should bill of lading not be supplied, buyers to be put in the same position as if they had been in possession of such documents. No bill of lading was tendered, but in its place a document on the shipowner's notepaper in these terms:

"Oct. 11, 1951. Rio Grande Bill of Lading No. 7. To the master porter of the hide berth in the North Carriers Dock, Liverpool. Deliver to Messrs. Colin & Shields the following goods: Light blue tag 1000 (One thousand) wetsalted ox-hides ex ss. Devis. (Signed) Lamport & Holt Line Ltd."

- C The buyers contended that that document addressed to the master porter, who was not at that date in possession of the goods, was not such a document as was contemplated by the contract as a ship's delivery order. It was submitted that the contractual goods were never shipped to the contractual destination—
- D Liverpool, that at the original arbitration the documents were held to be rightly rejected by the buyers because the bill of lading was for Manchester and not for Liverpool, and that that defect could not be cured by the issue of a delivery order. For there to be a valid delivery order, it was argued, there must be a valid bill of lading in existence even though it was not tendered to the buyers, and the contract envisaged that a bill of lading would be in existence. For instance,
- E by cl. 2 the bill of lading was to be proof of date of shipment in the absence of conclusive evidence to the contrary, and see that part of cl. 3 which provided that, if the bill of lading was not supplied, the buyers were to be put in the same position as if they had been in possession of it. On behalf of the sellers it was asserted that no bill of lading was necessary at all, that in any case the buyers were not entitled to it if a delivery order was substituted, that at the time the delivery order was made out and tendered it could make no difference that the goods were not then under the physical control of the person to whom the order was addressed, that it was sufficient if it were made out by the shipowners and addressed to someone who either had or would have the goods, and that it was, therefore, a proper document to tender under the contract.

- F Although the sellers struggled to overcome the initial blunder of the goods being shipped and carried under a bill of lading for Manchester, I am of opinion that they have failed to do so. In LORD ATKINSON'S summary in Johnson v. Taylor Brothers & Co., Ltd. (1) the vendor is bound, he says ([1920] A.C. 156):

"... to procure a contract of affreightment under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract."

- G The contract in the present case permitted transshipment, and provided, by cl. 3
- H (b) of the International Hide Booklet, that, if transshipment meant the drawing up of fresh bills of lading, payment should be made against presentation of the fresh documents which had been drawn up. No bill of lading, original or fresh, ever existed for the carriage of the goods to Liverpool, and, in my opinion, the sellers failed fundamentally to perform their contractual obligation by never having such a document. The delivery order tendered to the buyers did not overcome the omission. The contract provided that the documents should consist of bills of lading and/or ship's delivery order. A ship's delivery order must mean either a delivery order by the ship or to the ship. As provision is made for it to be countersigned, if required by the buyers, not only by a banker and the shipbroker, but also by the captain or mate, the contract would appear to contemplate a delivery order by the sellers to the ship requesting the ship to deliver to the buyers the goods shipped under the bill of lading. Such an order would entitle the buyers to receive the goods from the ship in the same way as would a bill of lading, and it would have to be given and presented while the goods were in the ship's possession. A

The Julia (2) was a case concerning a contract very different from this, with terms that are not to be found here and with a course of business controlling the performance, but I think it gives support for the view that a ship's delivery order means an order on the ship. But, whether that is so or not, or whether or not, on the true construction of this contract, a delivery order on the ship is required (if there is to be a substitute for a bill of lading), the delivery order must, at least, be to someone who holds the goods and who could attorn to the buyers. LORD NORMAND in The Julia (2) said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 282): B

"But I think that if the words 'delivery order' had had to be construed without the aid of the previous course of dealing, it would have been held to mean a document addressed to and accepted by one in physical possession of the goods. The sellers would then have been bound to tender a document which was, in fact, the legal equivalent of the goods." C

On Oct. 15, when the documents were tendered, the goods were in transit from Manchester to Liverpool. The master porter, to whom the delivery order was addressed, was not in possession of the goods, and, if they had never arrived and been received by him, the delivery order, so far as I can see, would have been worthless. It gave no rights to the buyers against the shipowner under the bill of lading or otherwise. Rio Grande Bill of Lading No. 7 is referred to, but that bill of lading did not provide for carriage to Liverpool. There was no attempt at a physical delivery of the goods and the delivery order was in no sense a symbolic delivery, or a legal equivalent, of the goods. In my opinion, it was not a document which complied with the requirements of the contract. D E

The sellers sought to rectify the position by having the goods, which had lain at Manchester for about six weeks, sent by dumb barge to Liverpool, and the award finds that it is customary to carry goods destined for Liverpool by dumb barge via the Ship Canal from Manchester. That statement is extremely vague. It could refer merely to local trade between Manchester and Liverpool. If it is intended to relate to goods arriving by ocean steamer, it fails to state the circumstances to which the custom would apply. Goods on a Manchester bill of lading are destined prima facie for Manchester, and I do not think the super-added words: "In transit to Liverpool", have any legal effect. The circumstances in which, by custom, goods might be sent on to Liverpool by dumb barge do not appear, and, in particular, no reference is made to the customary period of time in which the forwarding takes place or whether the goods are transferred direct from steamer to dumb barge or whether they are placed first on the quay. However, the statement as it stands seems to me to be an irrelevant finding. I cannot relate it to the contract, and nowhere does the award find expressly that the goods in question were handled and forwarded in accordance with the custom. If the bill of lading had been made out for delivery at Liverpool by a steamer bound for Manchester where alone she intended to discharge, it might well have been in accordance with custom for goods to be sent to Liverpool by dumb barge at the ship's expense. The practice would avoid the steamer herself calling at Liverpool (with the attendant expense and inconvenience), either on her way to Manchester or on her return, to unload a small parcel. Such a parcel might not be readily accessible and other cargo might have to be moved to give access to it, or the parcel might have to be moved and re-loaded unless transhipped to give access to Manchester cargo. If the goods had been so sent F G H on under a bill of lading for Liverpool, a good delivery might well have been made with either a bill of lading or a ship's delivery order. This would be subject to reasonable despatch, with which I have already dealt, and to another argument raised by the buyers' counsel.

A It was contended that a custom to forward goods by dumb barge to Liverpool, even if proved, could not apply to this contract because it would be inconsistent with the express term that the goods were to be carried by steamer or steamers with liberty to tranship, and that "steamer" was "to include any full-powered primarily engine driven vessel", and it was said that this was a transhipment. B The transfer of the goods from the ss. Devis at Manchester to the quay and then to the dumb barge must, I think, be regarded as a transhipment. Liverpool and Manchester are two separate ports, and the transfer cannot, perhaps, be regarded merely as a form of discharge even if it were immediately over side into the barge. C But Manchester, by its geographical position and its relation to Liverpool, at their respective ends of the Ship Canal, is hardly in the same position as a port of transhipment from which further ocean carriage is necessary. I prefer to reserve a final opinion on this point until it arises vitally for consideration. D I regard the submission as highly technical. It seems to me to have no business reason behind it and would probably never have been taken if major objections had not existed and spurred the inquiring and ingenious minds of counsel. I find nothing wrong with the invoice or the certificate of insurance which, in passing, I might add included craft risks to Liverpool and so would have covered the goods in the dumb barge from Oct. 15, 1951, the date of the certificate. In my judgment, for the reasons given, the buyers were justified in refusing to take up and pay for the documents tendered by the sellers on Oct. 15, 1951, and the sellers and not the buyers were in breach of the contract between them.

Question of law answered in favour of buyers.

Solicitors: Coward, Chance & Co. (for the buyers); Wilfred Ellis, agent for Weightman, Pedder & Co., Liverpool (for the sellers).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

MATALON v. MATALON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Hodson, L.JJ.), April 1, 1952.]

F Divorce — Judicial separation — Jurisdiction — Residence — Respondent husband temporarily in England for business and for proceedings to obtain custody of child—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 32.

G A wife petitioned for judicial separation on the ground of her husband's cruelty. Her husband was domiciled, and usually resided, in Jamaica, but at the time of the petition he had come to England temporarily for business purposes and also to pursue an application in the English courts for the custody of the child of the marriage. He had arrived in England on Aug. 20, 1950, and the petition was presented on Oct. 31, 1950, while he was still in England. He had no house in England, but moved from place to place, living in hotels and boarding-houses.

H HELD: on these facts the extent and quality of the husband's residence in England was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to entertain the petition for judicial separation.

Armstrong v. Armstrong ([1898] P. 178), applied.

AS TO JURISDICTION OF COURT IN MATRIMONIAL CAUSES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 691, para. 1027; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 11, pp. 421-428, Nos. 873-926.

Cases referred to:

(1) Collett v. Collett, (1843), 3 Curt. 726; 163 E.R. 881; 27 Digest 392, 3866.

- (2) Ex p. Breull, Re Bowie, (1880), 16 Ch.D. 484; 50 L.J.Ch. 384; 43 L.T. 580; 4 Digest 38, 322.
- (3) Armytage v. Armytage, [1898] P. 178; 67 L.J.P. 90; 78 L.T. 689; 27 Digest 264, 2321.
- (4) Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier, [1895] A.C. 517; 64 L.J.P.C. 97; 72 L.T. 873; 11 Digest 422, 885.
- (5) Firebrace v. Firebrace, (1878), 4 P.D. 63; 47 L.J.P. 41; 39 L.T. 94; 27 Digest 392, 3868.
- (6) Newton v. Newton, (1885), 11 P.D. 11; 55 L.J.P. 13; 27 Digest 549, 6005.
- (7) Thornton v. Thornton, (1886), 11 P.D. 176; 55 L.J.P. 40; 54 L.T. 774; 11 Digest 478, 1321.
- (8) Niboyet v. Niboyet, (1878), 4 P.D. 1; 48 L.J.P. 1; 39 L.T. 486; 43 J.P. 140; 11 Digest 423, 894.
- (9) Re Adoption Application No. 52/1951, [1951] 2 All E.R. 931; [1952] Ch. 16; 115 J.P. 625.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of Mr. Commissioner RHODES, made on Nov. 30, 1951, on an issue, holding that the extent and quality of the husband's residence in England was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to entertain a suit by the wife for judicial separation.

Leonard Lewis for the husband.

Nahum for the wife.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I will ask HODSON, L.J., to give the first judgment.

HODSON, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of Mr. Commissioner RHODES sitting at Manchester on Nov. 30, 1951, determining an issue between the parties which was raised in this way. On Oct. 31, 1950, the wife presented a petition for judicial separation from the husband on the ground of cruelty in which she alleged that neither she nor her husband was domiciled in England, but that she and also her husband were resident in England. By his answer the husband denied the cruelty. Subsequently, he amended his answer by stating that he was not, at the time of the commencement of the proceedings or at any other time, resident in England, and contended that, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. On that state of the pleadings, before the merits of the case were investigated, an issue was directed to be tried to determine whether the husband at the commencement of the proceedings or at any other time was not resident in England and whether in the premises the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the wife's petition. No question arises for determination as to onus of proof. The order was made by consent, and there was no discussion as to who should be plaintiff and who should be defendant. It was also agreed that the evidence should be by affidavit.

The evidence shows that the parties were married in April, 1946, the husband being then resident in and domiciled in Jamaica, where he was born. Up to that time the wife was resident and domiciled in England, where the marriage took place. They settled in Jamaica after the marriage, and a child, Sandra, was born on Dec. 16, 1947. Some time in 1948 the wife visited England. She returned to Jamaica in 1949, and in July, 1949, she left her husband in Jamaica and came to England. On Aug. 20, 1950, the husband came to England. He was in the cotton and textile business, and he had business connections in Manchester and London. He came partly on business, he being the representative or manager of a textile firm in Jamaica, and partly to get the custody of his child. Having arrived in England, the husband took out a summons under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, for the custody of the child. That summons has never been heard, proceedings under it being stayed having regard to the fact that on Oct. 31 the wife petitioned the court for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. That petition was served on the husband in England. I need not read in detail any of the evidence, but I think that it is necessary to read one paragraph from the wife's affidavit. In para. 7 she says:

"The [husband] remained in England from Aug. 20, 1950, until Dec. 20, 1950. After his return to England . . . I was again put in fear by his attitude and by his threats and that was why I consulted a solicitor. When I told him I had consulted a solicitor and told him the name of my solicitor he threatened physical violence against my said solicitor."

The husband, therefore, was in England between the dates I have mentioned. It is true he had no house in England, and, according to his evidence, he lived in hotels and boarding-houses, moving from one place to another in London and in Manchester in connection, not only with the business which he had with his customers and firms in England, but also in connection with his application for the custody of the child. The point which he has taken below and before us is that the quality of the residence which he had during this period was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction. Section 32 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which governs the position provides:

"The jurisdiction vested in the High Court and the Court of Appeal respectively shall, so far as regards procedure and practice, be exercised in the manner provided by this Act or by rules of court, and where no special provision is contained in this Act or in rules of court with reference thereto, any such jurisdiction shall be exercised as nearly as may be in the same manner as that in which it might have been exercised by the court to which it formerly appertained."

That, it is conceded, throws the court back to the practice and jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, and counsel for the husband has contended that the length, character, and quality of the residence here is insufficient because it would have been regarded as insufficient by the ecclesiastical courts, and, therefore, this court ought not to entertain the petition. He pointed out that one looks on a question of jurisdiction to the statute of Henry VIII, called the Statute of Citations (23 Hen. 8, c. 9), which was passed in affirmance of the common law, and he referred us to a decision of Dr. LUSHINGTON in Collett v. Collett (1). That case, undoubtedly, goes a long way to support his argument that the ecclesiastical courts, in considering the jurisdiction of dioceses, not the jurisdiction of the realm, did look to see that there was at any rate an element of permanence in the residence before asserting jurisdiction. Dr. LUSHINGTON, referring to the Statute of Citations, said (3 Curt. 729):

"That statute is the document by which this court must be governed in these proceedings; it was passed for the purpose of preventing abuses which took place, by reason of the process to appear in the Arches and other ecclesiastical courts being served on a party far from and out of the dioceses, where the party cited dwelt, not where the party might happen to be at the period of issuing the citation, but out of the diocese wherein he dwelt. No doubt the word dwell means a permanent dwelling: in no other part of the statute are there any words to give a different meaning to the words I have cited, and in the enactment the words are, 'That no manner of person shall be cited, or called to appear out of the diocese, wherein he shall be inhabiting at the time of the awarding or going forth of the citation.' Undoubtedly the word inhabit is here used in precisely the same sense as the word dwell in the prior part of the statute. The term inhabit is one to which many meanings have been attached by the law, and is one which can only be construed by reference to the circumstances of each individual case."

So, here one has to construe, not the word "residence", but the words "dwell" and "inhabit" which have been translated into "residence" in later cases, as is shown by the form of the pleading in those cases. In that connection

I would refer to Ex p. Breull Re Bowie (2), a bankruptcy case where JAMES, L.J., said (16 Ch.D. 486):

"There are cases in which it has been judicially decided, and I think rightly, that the words 'residence' and 'business' have no actual definite technical meaning, but that you must construe them in every case in accordance with the object and intent of the Act in which they occur."

In the present case the wife is complaining of cruelty and is maintaining on oath that, during the period of her husband's sojourn in this country, she is fearful of him by reason of threats which have been made. It so happens that a very similar set of facts was considered in Armytage v. Armytage (3). The relevant statutory provision then in force was the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 22, which corresponds in effect to s. 32 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. That case has always been considered to be an authoritative decision on the matters there decided. Counsel for the husband has faced the difficulties presented by that case by saying that what it really decided was not what is sufficient residence to give jurisdiction, but whether residence in a case of this kind gave jurisdiction at all. I think that is perfectly true so far as the decision itself is concerned. Nevertheless, the facts in that case were more nearly parallel to the facts in the present matter than one usually expects to find. The case was one in which cruelty was alleged and GORELL BARNES, J., stated the facts as follows ([1898] P. 184):

"At the end of June, 1897, the respondent came to, and has since resided in, England, but I understand he has not taken up a permanent residence here, and has only come to and is remaining in England for the purpose of enforcing, and so long as may be necessary to determine, such rights as he may have against the petitioner with regard to the children."

So far as the facts are there set out, that case was weaker than the present one, because here the husband had the initial incentive in coming to this country on business. It is to be noted that the point was never taken by the experienced counsel who appeared for the husband in Armytage v. Armytage (3) that the quality of the residence was insufficient to found jurisdiction. Nevertheless, the matter was very fully discussed by GORELL BARNES, J., and he put the question in this way (ibid., 186):

"The petitioner maintains that the test of domicile is not applicable as in a suit for dissolution of marriage, and that the ecclesiastical courts would have given her relief where she and her husband are both residing in England in the circumstances proved, whereas the respondent maintains that no relief would have been given because the parties are not domiciled in England, and no act of cruelty has been proved within the jurisdiction."

Counsel for the husband points out that residence in the jurisdiction was postulated, but in discussing the matter GORELL BARNES, J., cited a long passage from the speech of LORD WATSON in the well-known case before the Privy Council of Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (4) where he said ([1895] A.C. 527):

"If, for instance, a husband deserts his wife, although their residence be of a temporary character . . . and the husband treats his wife with such a degree of cruelty as to render her continuance in his society intolerable, the weight of opinion among international jurists, and the general practice, is to the effect that the courts of the residence are warranted in giving the remedy of judicial separation, without reference to the domicile of the parties'."

I will go now to the following passage in the judgment of GORELL BARNES, J. ([1898] P. 192):

"I conclude from the writers to whom I have referred that most of them are disposed to consider that the courts of the country in which the parties are living, though not domiciled, ought to have the right in a matrimonial suit to afford protection to an injured party from the cruelty of the other party. LORD HANNEN may possibly have had such a case in his mind when, in giving judgment in Firebrace v. Firebrace (5), he said (4 P.D. 67), 'The domicile of the wife is that of the husband, and her remedy for matrimonial wrongs must be usually sought in the place of that domicile'; but added 'It is not, however, inconsistent with this principle that a wife should be allowed in some cases to obtain relief against her husband in the tribunal of the country in which she is resident, though not domiciled.' That was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights where the respondent, the husband, who was domiciled in Australia, had left England before the institution of the suit, and it was held that the court had not jurisdiction over him after he left this country, and that the suit could not be maintained. Had he remained in England it would seem from the cases of Newton v. Newton (6) and Thornton v. Thornton (7) that the suit could have been maintained."

I will also read a passage to which counsel for the husband referred, where, after dealing with some of the old learning of the ecclesiastical courts, the learned judge in reference to the general principles and practice of the courts said (ibid., 193):

"These are stated in general terms so far as concerns the matter under consideration by JAMES, L.J., in his judgment above referred to [Niboyet v. Niboyet (8) (4 P.D. 3)], where the jurisdiction of the court christian is considered, and it is pointed out that the church and its jurisdiction had nothing to do with the original nationality or acquired domicile of the parties, that residence as distinct from casual presence on a visit or in itinere was an important element, but that residence had no connection with or little analogy to the question of a person's domicile."

The learned judge was, therefore, alive to the necessity for something more than a casual presence or a visit when towards the end of the judgment he said this (ibid., 196):

"... no valid reason can be urged against the courts of a country, in which a husband and wife are actually living, pronouncing a decree which will protect the one against the other so long as they remain within the jurisdiction."

Then GORELL BARNES, J., refers to the facts of the particular case, and says in reference to the husband (ibid., 197):

"He has come here and subjected himself to the jurisdiction of the courts of this country. Could anything be more unreasonable than for this court to hold that it has no power to suspend the wife's obligation to live with her husband while in this country, and leave her to proceed in the courts in Australia to protect herself against her husband in England? It may, I think, be safely laid down that the ecclesiastical courts would formerly, and this court will now, interfere to protect a wife against the cruelty of her husband, both being within the jurisdiction, when the necessities of the case require such intervention. I therefore hold that this court has jurisdiction to entertain this suit, and I pronounce a decree of judicial separation in favour of the petitioner..."

In my judgment, the learned commissioner was right in taking the view that, although the point was not directly decided in Armytage v. Armytage (3), yet, in his careful judgment, GORELL BARNES, J., laid down sufficient guidance for him to ascertain the extent and the quality of the residence which was necessary to found jurisdiction in this case. Following that guidance, he thought, and I think rightly thought, that the facts warranted an assumption of jurisdiction, and, therefore, I think he rightly decided the issue in favour of the wife.

There is only one other case to which I think reference should be made, and I do this out of deference to the argument of counsel for the husband. He referred us to a recent decision of HARMAN, J., in Re Adoption Application No. 52/1951 (9), an application made by a woman regarding the adoption of a child under the Adoption Act, 1950. The question to be determined arose on the construction, first of all, of s. 2 (5) of the Act which provides:

"An adoption order shall not be made in England unless the applicant and the infant reside in England . . ."

I need say no more than I have already impliedly said by my citation from the passage in JAMES, L.J.'s, judgment in Re Bowie (2). These questions of construction have to be decided against the background of the subject-matter. Although HARMAN, J., in that case held that a woman who had remained in England, while her husband had gone back to Nigeria where he and she were resident, for the purpose of making an application for the adoption of the child did not qualify within the meaning of the Act because the word "resident" there denoted some degree of permanence, that case gives very little assistance. It is not necessary for this court to express any opinion whether, on the construction of the word "resident" in that Act, that decision was right. I am not for one moment to be taken as throwing any doubt on the correctness of that decision. In my judgment, this appeal fails.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Fletcher, Napper & Co. (for the husband); Birkbeck, Julius, Edwards & Coburn, agents for A. L. Hamwee & Co., Manchester (for the wife).
[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re WYATT (deceased).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Collingwood, J.), March 26, April 2, 1952.]

Will — Revocation — By oral evidence — Standard of proof required.

In 1935 the deceased made a will, and in 1937 she executed a codicil thereto by which she appointed the plaintiff bank to be executors of her will. In October, 1937, she instructed a solicitor to prepare another will which was duly executed and deposited with the plaintiff bank. On May 4, 1939, the deceased withdrew this later will from the bank and it was never seen again, nor was there any information available concerning its contents except that it was the solicitor's usual practice to include a revocation clause in any draft will and to submit each draft will to the proposed testator or testatrix for perusal and approval. On a motion by the plaintiff bank for an order that the first will and codicil be admitted to probate,

HELD: where it is sought to prove the revocation of an earlier will by oral evidence only, such evidence must be "stringent and conclusive"; there was no such evidence in this case; and, therefore, probate of the first will and codicil would be granted.

Cutto v. Gilbert (1854) (9 Moo. P.C.C. 131), applied.

AS TO REVOCATION OF WILL BY LATER WILL, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 78-83, paras. 110-116; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 320-348, Nos. 1532-1781.

Cases referred to:

(1) Brown v. Brown, (1858), 8 E. & B. 876; 27 L.J.Q.B. 173; 30 L.T.O.S. 273; 120 E.R. 327; 23 Digest 108, 1018.

- (2) Wood v. Wood, (1867), L.R. 1 P. & D. 309; 36 L.J.P. & M. 34; 15 L.T. 593; 31 J.P. 567; 44 Digest 343, 1726.
- (3) Cutto v. Gilbert, (1854), 9 Moo. P.C.C. 131; 24 L.T.O.S. 193; 14 E.R. 247; 44 Digest 331, 1614.
- (4) Hitchins v. Basset, (1694), 2 Salk. 592; 91 E.R. 495; 44 Digest 343, 1729.
- (5) Goodright d. Rolfe v. Harwood, (1775), 7 Bro. Parl. Cas. 489; 3 E.R. 318; 44 Digest 343, 1723.
- A (6) Hellier v. Hellier, (1884), 9 P.D. 237; 53 L.J.P. 105; 49 J.P. 8; 44 Digest 342, 1721.
- (7) In the Estate of Hampshire, [1951] W.N. 174.

MOTION for an order that a will dated Jan. 2, 1935, and codicil thereto dated Apr. 12, 1937, be admitted to probate.

- B J. A. Gibson for the plaintiff bank.
Victor Russell for the Treasury Solicitor.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 2. COLLINGWOOD, J., read the following judgment. This is a motion for an order that a will, dated Jan. 2, 1935, and the codicil thereto, dated Apr. 12, 1937, be admitted to probate on the application of the National Provincial Bank as executors thereof.

- C On Dec. 25, 1950, the deceased, Charlotte Frances Wyatt, died a widow, leaving, so far as can be ascertained, no person entitled to her estate as next of kin, and, accordingly, notice of motion was served on the Treasury Solicitor. On Jan. 2, 1935, she executed a will by which she appointed Lloyds Bank, Ltd., to be executor and trustee and left all her real and personal estate in trust
- D for her husband for life and on his death on trust as to two-thirds of the capital and income for the Poor People's Dispensary for Sick Animals and as to one-third for the National Canine League. On Apr. 12, 1937, she executed a codicil to this will, substituting the plaintiff bank, the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., as executors. This will and codicil were deposited by her for safe keeping at the Wallington branch of the plaintiff bank, where she had for some years
- E been a customer. There they remained until after her death, when they were transferred to the trustee department of the bank. In October, 1937, she instructed a solicitor to prepare another will. The solicitor has no recollection of what was said to him by the deceased on this, the only, occasion on which he visited her beyond that she expressed a wish to make provision for the benefit of institutions providing homes for animals. He has no recollection of receiving
- F any written instructions from her and all papers in his firm's offices were completely destroyed by burning as the result of enemy bombing in May, 1941. No one connected with the firm has any recollection of any matter concerning the preparation or contents of the will. It is clear, however, that a will was, in fact, executed, and on Nov. 4, 1937, the solicitor sent a completed copy of it
- G to the trustee department of the National Provincial Bank, asking whether they were prepared to accept the appointment as executor and trustee, and on Nov. 5 the bank replied accepting the appointment and returning the copy. From the records of the bank it appears that this will was deposited with the Wallington branch on the day of the execution (Nov. 1, 1937), and was withdrawn by the deceased on Dec. 30, 1937. It was returned to the bank on May 23, 1938, and was finally withdrawn by the deceased on May 4, 1939, after which the bank
- H have no further trace of it. It was not found among the deceased's effects, and no information has been forthcoming with regard to it despite advertisements inserted in local and other newspapers. In these circumstances the presumption arises that the will was destroyed by the testatrix with the intention of revoking it, and, in the absence of any evidence to repel it, that presumption prevails.

The question then arises: Did the will of November, 1937, revoke the previous will of 1935? The mere fact of making a subsequent testamentary paper does not effect a total revocation of a prior one unless the later document expressly or impliedly revokes the former one. On the other hand, the execution of a second will which expressly revokes—or is entirely inconsistent with a former one—revokes the first even though the second will is not forthcoming at the death of the testator, and its contents are proved by oral evidence: Brown v. Brown (1); Wood v. Wood (2). But in such a case the authorities show that there must be clear proof of the provisions of the missing will. In Cutto v. Gilbert (3) DR. LUSHINGTON, after agreeing with the proposition that the onus probandi lay on the party seeking to prove the revocation, said (9 Moo. P.C.C. 140):

“The fact first to be proved, is the execution of some subsequent testamentary paper; and we here think it right to observe, that we are of opinion, that where the revocation of an existing will is sought to be established by the proof of the execution of a subsequent will not appearing, and where there is no draft or instructions in writing, when such fact is to be proved by oral evidence only, such evidence ought to be most clear and satisfactory; for we concur in the opinion which has been expressed by very learned persons, that to revoke an existing will by parol evidence alone that another will has been executed, is, though the law may admit of it, a course of proceeding not unattended with danger, and, consequently, that such oral evidence ought to be stringent and conclusive.”

Thus, in Hitchins v. Basset (4), where it was proved that a subsequent will had been executed, but no evidence was available as to its contents, the earlier will was held not to be revoked. And the same result was reached where the subsequent will was found to have contained a different disposition from the earlier, but in what particulars it differed was unknown: Goodright d. Rolfe v. Harwood (5).

In Cutto v. Gilbert (3) DR. LUSHINGTON further states (ibid., 147):

“There is not one authority which lays down the proposition that the execution of a subsequent will destroyed animo revocandi by the testator, the contents of which are not known, revokes a prior will. On the contrary, in all the cases where revocation has been held to be effected, there has been proof of a difference of disposition. These considerations alone would induce us to doubt the correctness of the judgment in the court below, in the case now under consideration; but the very foundation of that judgment appears to us to be unsound; that judgment is mainly based upon the evidence that the latter paper contained the words, ‘This is my last will and testament’. We are of opinion, that these words do not import that the paper contained a different disposition of the property, nor that the mere fact of so calling it could possibly render it a revocatory instrument.”

In Hellier v. Hellier (6) a testator made a will in 1864, appointing his wife sole executrix, and in 1877 he executed another document. There was no evidence of the contents of the second document, but after its execution the testator said: “I have made a will altering my affairs . . .”, and at the foot of the earlier will was a memorandum: “This will is now useless, a new will having been made in October, 1877, upon my wife telling me she was sorry she had ever seen me”. It was held that, in the absence of proof of an alteration of executrix or a revocatory clause, or a disposition wholly inconsistent with the first will, that will was not revoked, and was entitled to probate.

In his affidavit of Feb. 12, 1952, the solicitor states that it was his practice to include a revocation clause in any draft will prepared by him on the instructions of a client, and he went on to describe the various stages of preparation which were customary, including the sending of the draft for perusal and approval, and the making of any amendments or deletions necessitated thereby, and final engrossment. He had, however, no recollection of any of these matters in relation to the will in question. From this I was invited on behalf of the Treasury Solicitor to draw the conclusion that the lost will contained a revocation clause. I was referred to the report of In the Estate of Hampshire (7). The report is a short one, but I think it is clear from the judgment that the learned judge had evidence before him which he felt (to quote his own word) "compelled" him to find that the missing will contained both a revocation clause and an effective disposition of the whole estate of the testator.

In this case, on the evidence before me, I think that so to find involves the assumption that the solicitor's usual procedure was in fact followed in the present instance, and the further assumption that the testatrix accepted the draft as correctly expressing her intentions in the matter. In my opinion, I ought not to make these assumptions in respect of a will the contents of which are wholly unknown. To do so would, I think, be to substitute surmise for the "stringent and conclusive" oral evidence required by DR. LUSHINGTON in Cutto v. Gilbert (3), and thereby, to use his words, to pursue "a course of proceeding not unattended with danger."

Grant of probate of will dated Jan. 2, 1935, and codicil thereto dated Apr. 12, 1937.

Solicitors: Chas. J. Odhams & Sons (for the plaintiff bank); Treasury Solicitor.
[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

ALLIANCE BUILDING SOCIETY v. SHAVE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), April 1, 1952.]

Mortgage—Possession of mortgaged property—Mortgagor not in occupation—Order for possession against occupier although mortgagor not joined in proceedings—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, r. 8A.

In 1948 the borrowers charged by way of legal mortgage a dwelling-house to secure repayment to the mortgagee of £765, with interest, by equal monthly instalments. The charge provided inter alia that the statutory power of sale should be exercisable free from the restrictions imposed by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 103. The instalments fell into arrear, and the mortgagee desired to take possession of the dwelling-house which was in the occupation of one, B., the borrowers having vacated the premises. The mortgagee claimed to be entitled to an order for possession notwithstanding that only B. was joined as a defendant to the summons.

HELD: notwithstanding the form of order prescribed in R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 8A, an order for possession could be made against B. without any such order being made against the borrowers, and as the borrowers could not be prejudiced by the making of such an order in their absence, it was proper to make the order in this case.

Alliance Building Society v. Varma ([1949] 2 All E.R. 261), applied.

Martins Bank, Ltd. v. Kavanagh ([1948] 2 All E.R. 448), distinguished.

AS TO RELIEF CLAIMABLE BY ORIGINATING SUMMONS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, p. 106, para. 209; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, 2nd Supp.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Martins Bank, Ltd. v. Kavanagh, [1948] 2 All E.R. 448; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Temperance Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Nevitt, [1940] 3 All E.R. 237; 163 L.T. 234; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Alliance Building Society v. Varma, [1949] 2 All E.R. 261; [1949] Ch. 724; [1949] L.J.R. 1452; 2nd Digest Supp.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

By an originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, the Alliance Building Society, as mortgagee, sought an order that the defendants and each of them should deliver up possession of land and premises known as No. 48, Castle Road, Winton, Bournemouth, and comprised in a legal charge, dated Oct. 22, 1948, and made between the first two defendants, Francis Harry Shave and Ivor

Frederick Charles Shave (thereinafter together called "the borrowers"), of the one part, and the plaintiff, of the other part. By the said legal charge the borrowers charged the said land and premises by way of legal mortgage with the payment to the plaintiff of £765, with interest, by monthly instalments. The legal charge contained an attornment clause in the usual form and a joint and several covenant by the borrowers to pay to the plaintiff £765, with interest, by monthly instalments during the term of twenty-five years, the first payment to be made on Nov. 9, 1948. It was further provided that, if there were default by the borrowers for two months in making any of the payments covenanted to be made, then the whole principal money thereby secured and the interest thereon should become immediately due and payable and the statutory power of sale and of appointing a receiver might be exercised immediately. The borrowers having made default in the payments under the legal charge, the tenancy (under the attornment clause) expired or was determined by notice to quit which expired on Nov. 22, 1951. At the date of the notice the payments were in arrear for upwards of two months. The third defendant, Bartlett, was in occupation of the premises at the date of the present hearing, the borrowers having vacated the property (according to the plaintiff's evidence) since these proceedings were commenced. The first and the third defendants were served with the summons, but none of the defendants entered an appearance. The summons was argued on the footing that the order ought to be granted even though neither of the borrowers had been joined. The third defendant, according to a statement made after judgment by counsel for the plaintiff, was, so far as the plaintiff was aware, in occupation as licensee of the borrowers, but there was no evidence on the matter.

Denys B. Buckley for the plaintiff.

The defendants were not represented.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is a summons by the plaintiff as mortgagee asking for an order for possession of the mortgaged premises. The defendants are three in number. The first two are the mortgagors, and the third is the person who alone is in possession of the mortgaged premises. The summons comes before me because it has only been found possible to serve the first defendant and the last defendant. The second defendant, a co-mortgagor with the first defendant, has not been found. The case has been argued before me on the basis that an order for possession ought to be made even although neither of the first two defendants, the mortgagors, had been joined.

I confess at once that, had the matter been free from authority, I should have found little difficulty in acceding to the application, but it becomes necessary to consider one or two cases. The chief authority which appears to stand in the way of the plaintiff is Martins Bank, Ltd. v. Kavanagh (1). In that case in 1944 the defendant charged a farm by way of legal mortgage with the payment of certain moneys to the plaintiff bank. In 1947 she was adjudicated bankrupt, but she remained in occupation of the farm. The plaintiff bank issued an originating summons claiming possession of the farm and before the master elected not to add as a defendant the trustee in bankruptcy, in whom, of course, the equity of redemption was vested. The matter came before ROXBURGH, J., who delivered a reserved judgment. He dealt with two points which had been raised before him. The first was a question of procedure, on which he held that the application was properly made by originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A. The second was whether or not, on the basis that the application was properly made by summons, the trustee in bankruptcy should have been joined, and ROXBURGH, J., held that he should have been joined. On that point, after he had referred on the first point to Temperance Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Nevitt (2), he said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 449):

"The Court of Appeal, in the case to which I have already referred, held that there the mortgagor was a necessary party. The form of order prescribed by Ord. 55, r. 8A, contemplates that the mortgagor will be a party, but, furthermore, the application involves a step in the enforcement of the security which may prejudice the person entitled to the equity of redemption. I am satisfied, therefore, that he ought to be a defendant under the existing practice of the Chancery Division."

A It will be observed that ROXBURGH, J., rests his decision on two distinct grounds, the first being that the form of order prescribed by Ord. 55, r. 8A, contemplates that the mortgagor will be a party.

B Since that case was decided, Alliance Building Society v. Varma (3) has come before the Court of Appeal. In that case by a conveyance in September, 1945, a mortgagor acquired property which, by a mortgage of the same date, he charged to the plaintiff society with the payment of a secured sum by instalments. Before the date of the conveyance by which he acquired the property, the mortgagor had been permitted by the vendors to enter into possession of the property, and he agreed with the second defendant in the case that she should go into possession as tenant at will. In 1948 the instalments had fallen into arrears, and the plaintiff society took out an originating summons under Ord. 55, r. 5A, against the second defendant claiming possession. The Court of Appeal held that Ord. 55, r. 5A, gave the court power to make an order for delivery up of possession to the plaintiff against the second defendant, as being a person in possession of the property, even though she was neither the mortgagor nor a person claiming to derive title under him. It is true that the mortgagor was made a party, but, in the course of his judgment, SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, D M.R., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 263):

" . . . there only remains the question of the form of the order. The second defendant is in occupation of the mansion house and the right order to make will be an order that she deliver up to the plaintiffs within the proper time possession of the premises described in the schedule to the summons or such part thereof as she now occupies. As the mortgagor is not in occupation of anything, no order is required against him, and, therefore, it appears to be proper not to make any other order on the summons save to give to the plaintiffs the right to add their costs of the summons and of the appeal to this court to their security."

E The effect of that judgment is that, notwithstanding the form of order prescribed by Ord. 55, r. 8A, which will be found in the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1949, vol. 2, at p. 2759, an order for possession can be made against a stranger in title and no order need be made against the mortgagor. I, therefore, feel constrained to conclude that the first ground on which ROXBURGH, J., based his judgment in Martins Bank, Ltd. v. Kavanagh (1) no longer binds me.

G There remains the second ground, viz., that the application involves a step in the enforcement of the security which may prejudice the person entitled to the equity of redemption. No doubt, if in a case it can be shown that such an application may prejudice the person entitled to the equity of redemption, the court will insist on that person being before it. In Martins Bank, Ltd. v. Kavanagh (1) there must have been some circumstance which, to the mind of ROXBURGH, J., pointed to the likelihood of such prejudice arising. I do not, on consideration, read the judgment of ROXBURGH, J., as preventing me in the case before me from inquiring whether or not any such prejudice can arise. In the present case, by the terms of the legal mortgage, it is expressly provided that the statutory power of sale shall be exercisable free from the restrictions imposed by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 103. I have carefully considered whether in any respect, in the circumstances of the present case, it could be postulated that to make an order against this stranger to the title, in the absence of the mortgagors, could possibly prejudice them. In my judgment, it is impossible to discover any such circumstance, and, therefore, I feel free to treat this case as distinguishable from Martins Bank, Ltd. v. Kavanagh (1). For these reasons, I propose to accede to the application and I shall make the order for possession.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Boxall & Boxall, agents for Cardens, Brighton (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re BATLEY (deceased). PUBLIC TRUSTEE AND ANOTHER v.
HERT AND OTHERS. Varied. C.A. [1952] 2 All E.R.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 26, April 4, 1952.]

Income Tax—Annuity—Annuity free of income tax—Reliefs and allowances—Liability to account to trustees—Annuitant's husband assessed in respect of his and annuitant's joint incomes—Husband, and not annuitant, entitled to claim for relief.

By his will, dated Jan. 27, 1937, and made shortly after his divorce from the annuitant, his first wife, and on the day of his marriage to his second wife, the testator bequeathed "free of duty to my former wife . . . an annuity of £416 for her life . . . such annuity to be considered as a continuance of the alimony which I am paying her during my lifetime . . . thus continuing after my death the payments of alimony which I am making to her during my lifetime. But if at any time during the lifetime of my second wife . . . such annuity of £416 should exceed the amount of one-third of the total income of my estate after payment of income tax then and in such case the amount to be paid . . . by way of such annuity shall be such one-third of the total income of my estate after payment of income tax . . ." After the annuitant had re-married in 1939 her second husband was assessed to income tax in respect of their joint incomes and he was entitled to claim income tax reliefs in respect of their personal allowances as husband and wife. In consequence, the annuitant was not liable to pay income tax on her annuity and was not entitled to claim any appropriate relief. During his life the testator paid the alimony without deduction of income tax, no claim for any rebate of tax under the Income Tax Acts was made by the annuitant or her husband, and the testator never asked them to make a claim. On May 4, 1947, the testator died. On a summons taken out by the trustees of his will after his death it was held that the annuity was payable free of income tax, but without prejudice to the question whether the annuitant was liable to account for income tax relief in accordance with the rule in Re Pettit ([1922] 2 Ch. 765). On a summons by the trustees of the will to determine this question,

HELD: the annuitant was a trustee of her statutory right to recover the income tax overpaid in respect of her annuity and was bound, at the request of the trustees of the will, to exercise that right, and, if necessary for that purpose, to apply to be assessed separately from her husband, under the Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 17 (1), and any relief or allowances by way of repayment of income tax recovered or recoverable by the annuitant and her husband, or by either of them, in respect of and so far as was attributable to the annuity, belonged to the trustees of the testator's will, in accordance with the rule in Re Pettit (supra).

Re Kingcome ([1936] 1 All E.R. 173), applied.

AS TO TAX-FREE ANNUITIES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 28, pp. 214-216, paras. 386-388; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 39, pp. 166-168, Nos. 572-593.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Batley, [1951] Ch. 558.
- (2) Re Pettit, [1922] 2 Ch. 765; 91 L.J.Ch. 732; 127 L.T. 491; 39 Digest 167, 587.
- (3) Re Maclellan, [1939] 3 All E.R. 81; [1939] Ch. 750; 108 L.J.Ch. 364; 160 L.T. 612; Digest Supp.
- (4) Re Eves, [1939] Ch. 969; 108 L.J.Ch. 374; 161 L.T. 270; Digest Supp.
- (5) Re Tatham, [1945] 1 All E.R. 29; [1945] Ch. 34; 114 L.J.Ch. 9; 172 L.T. 14; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Re Williams, [1945] 2 All E.R. 102; [1945] Ch. 320; 115 L.J.Ch. 101; 173 L.T. 132; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Re Arno, [1947] 1 All E.R. 64; [1947] Ch. 198; [1947] L.J.R. 435; 176 L.T. 152; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (8) Re Lyons, [1952] 1 All E.R. 34; [1952] Ch. 129.
- (9) Re Jones, [1933] Ch. 842; 102 L.J.Ch. 303; 149 L.T. 417; Digest Supp.
- (10) Re Kingcome, [1936] 1 All E.R. 173; [1936] Ch. 566; 105 L.J.Ch. 209; 154 L.T. 462; Digest Supp.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Charles Gurson Batley, deceased, and in the events which had happened, any relief or allowances by way of repayment of income tax recovered or recoverable by the first and second defendants, Dorothy Hert and John Albert Hert, the testator's first wife and her present husband, or either of them, in respect of and so far as was attributable to an annuity bequeathed to the first defendant by the testator's will free of income tax belonged to the plaintiffs as trustees of the will in accordance with the rule in Re Pettit (2) ([1922] 2 Ch. 765). The second defendant was assessed to tax in respect of his and the first defendant's joint incomes, and the first defendant contended inter alia that the reliefs or allowances in respect of the annuity were not repayable to the testator's estate, as the second defendant, being the accountable party, could not be compelled to account to the trustees of the will.

McMullen for the plaintiffs, the trustees.

J. F. Bowyer for the first and second defendants, the testator's first wife (the annuitant) and her husband.

Fletcher-Cooke for the third defendant (the testator's second wife) and the fourth and fifth defendants, the remaindermen (infant children of the testator's second marriage).

Cur. adv. vult.

April 4. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. This originating summons is supplemental to an earlier summons between the same parties, with the exception that to the present summons there is an added defendant, John Albert Hert, who is the husband of Dorothy Hert, the first defendant to both summonses. The previous case is reported [sub nom. Re Batley (1)] and I will summarise the headnote to the report. The testator by his will, which was made on Jan. 27, 1937, shortly after his divorce from his first wife (the said Dorothy Hert), and on the same day as his marriage to his second wife (the defendant, Grace Lucy Smith), bequeathed

" . . . free of duty to my former wife . . . an annuity of £416 for her life . . . such annuity to be considered as a continuance of the alimony which I am paying her during my lifetime and to be paid to her at the rate of £32 every four weeks thus continuing after my death the payments of alimony which I am making to her during my lifetime."

The will further provided that if at any time during the lifetime of his second wife

" . . . such annuity of £416 should exceed the amount of one-third of the total income of my estate after payment of income tax then and in such case the amount to be paid . . . by way of such annuity shall be such one-third of the total income of my estate after payment of income tax . . . ”

The testator's marriage to his first wife had been dissolved by decree absolute on Dec. 21, 1936, and on that day an order was made by consent that the testator should as from that day pay or cause to be paid to her during their joint lives and until further order maintenance at the rate of £7 (not £8) free of tax per week, the said sum to be paid monthly. He had no issue by his first wife. By his second wife he had two children, who are the infant defendants to both summonses. The first wife married the defendant, John Albert Hert, on June 27, 1939. The testator during his life paid to the first wife £8 (not £7) free of tax per week by equal monthly instalments, namely, £416 per annum tax free. He died on May 4, 1947, and his will, with a codicil immaterial for the present purpose, was proved by the Public Trustee and Arthur Bolden (plaintiffs in both the summonses) on Aug. 22, 1947. His second wife was married to one Charles Frederick Smith on Sept. 3, 1949.

The first summons came before me on Nov. 22, 1950, when I held (among other things) that the annuity was subject to and not free of income tax. From that part of my order the first wife appealed, and on Mar. 8, 1951, the Court of Appeal varied my decision and held and declared that the annuity was payable free of income tax, but such declaration was expressed to be without prejudice to the question whether or not the first wife was liable to account for income tax relief in accordance with the rule in Re Pettit (2). That question is, accordingly, now raised by the present summons, which asks whether on the true construction of the testator's will and in the events which have happened the first wife is entitled to retain for her own benefit any relief or allowances by way of repayment of income tax to which she is entitled or whether she must account for the same or any part thereof to the plaintiffs in accordance with the rule in Re Pettit (2).

The first wife has deposed that her husband, John Albert Hert, is assessed to income tax in respect of their joint incomes, that he alone is entitled to claim income tax reliefs in respect of their personal allowances as husband and wife, and that she herself does not, and is not entitled to, make any claim for such relief. John Albert Hert was joined as a defendant to the present summons on Jan. 23, 1952, and a further paragraph was added to the summons during the hearing before me raising the further question of this defendant's liability to account, which seemed to me to arise by implication from the question of the first wife's liability reserved by the order of the Court of Appeal [in Re Batley (1)]. It was objected on behalf of the first wife that her husband was not a proper party to the present summons and that the further question ought not to be raised in this proceeding, but I overruled the objection and will deal with both questions.

The first point that occurs to me is that, by a parity of reasoning to that on which the decision of the Court of Appeal in the former proceeding was based, the answers to the questions may depend on the practice adopted by the testator with respect to the weekly sums paid by him in his lifetime, and that, if he was content to allow his former wife and her present husband to retain the benefit of any allowances, making no claim in that respect for himself, it should be assumed that the annuity given “in continuation of” those sums should carry and include the same privilege. The testator was a solicitor, and is hardly likely to have acted or refrained from acting in the matter per incuriam. There is no evidence on the point, but I understand that no claim for any rebate was, in fact, made either by the first wife or her husband in the testator's lifetime, and that the testator never asked them or either of them to make such a claim. I have come to the conclusion, however, that I ought not to decide the matter on that short and simple ground, and must disregard the action or inaction of the testator as irrelevant.

Re Pettit (2) laid down a principle which is, on the face of it, quite simple, and it is somewhat surprising to find how many difficulties have arisen in the application of it. The headnote to the report is:

"Testator gives an annuity free of income tax, and the annuitant, under the provisions of the Income Tax Acts, obtains relief by way of repayment of income tax in excess of the amount properly payable by him:—Held, that the residuary estate of the testator is entitled to such proportion of the sum so repaid as the annuity bears to the total income of the annuitant."

In his judgment, ROMER, J., said ([1922] 2 Ch. 770):

"... if ... the annuitant is repaid the excess by the Special Commissioners, I cannot understand on what ground it can be suggested that such excess should be retained by the annuitant who has not paid it, and not be handed back to the residuary legatees who have."

That, of course, is the gist of the matter. The principle has been applied in a large number of reported cases, such as Re Maclellan (3), which was a case of an annuity payable under a deed, Re Eves (4), Re Tatham (5), Re Williams (6), Re Arno (7) and Re Lyons (8).

The present case is, in my judgment, covered by these authorities (Re Jones (9) having, I think, no application to it), and I doubt whether this could have been questioned if the first wife were discoverd and liable to be directly assessed to tax. The only difficulty, to my mind, arises from the circumstance that it is the husband of the first wife, and not she herself, who is liable to pay the income tax on her income and entitled to claim any appropriate reliefs. It is remarkable that this aspect of the matter has never, so far as I know, been judicially considered hitherto. The contentions put forward on behalf of the first wife are that the appropriate statutory relief is not repayable to the testator's estate (i) on the construction of the will (applying Re Jones (9))—this contention I have rejected—and (ii) on the ground that her husband, being the accountable party, cannot be compelled to account to the trustees of the will. The position of a husband in regard to the tax on his wife's income is tolerably well settled: see KONSTAM'S LAW OF INCOME TAX, 11th ed., paras. 298-300. I am inclined to the view that the husband in the present case, if he obtained the appropriate relief in respect of the annuity, would hold it impressed with a trust in favour of the testator's estate, and, if necessary, I should be prepared to decide that he is, in the circumstances, under an obligation to claim the relief for the benefit pro tanto of the estate. But I prefer to base my judgment on the authority of Re Kingcome (10) (considered and approved in Re Lyons (8)), by holding that the first wife is a trustee of her statutory right to recover the overpaid tax and is bound, at the request of the trustees of the will, to exercise that right, and, if necessary, to apply to be, for that purpose, under the Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 17 (1), assessed separately from her husband. I adopt from the judgment of BENNETT, J. ([1936] Ch. 569) in Re Kingcome (10) the statement that "... the court ought to do everything it can to enable the income tax that has been overpaid to be recovered."

Of course, a separate assessment may not have to be made in actual fact if the first wife or her husband are willing to pay over and account for the amount which she could and would have obtained if such an assessment had been made.

I think that I should deal with the questions raised in para. 1 and para. 2 of the re-amended summons in a somewhat different form from that which is suggested, and so I will declare that, on the true construction of the testator's will and in the events which have happened, any relief or allowances by way of repayment of income tax recovered or recoverable by the defendants, Dorothy Hert and John Albert Hert, or either of them in respect of and so far as is attributable to the annuity bequeathed to the said Dorothy Hert by the testator's will free of income tax belong to the plaintiffs as trustees of such will, in accordance with the rule in Re Pettit (2). There will be liberty to apply, and, unless other arrangements are made to give effect to the foregoing declaration, I should order the wife to apply and the husband to support her application to be separately assessed. No representation order on this occasion is necessary.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Maxwell, Batley & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Chalton Hubbard & Co., agents for Marsh & Ferriman, Worthing (for the first and second defendants); Collyer-Bristow & Co., agents for Birkett, Ridley & Bartley, Ipswich (for the remaining defendants).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. OWEN.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Ormerod and Parker, J.J.), April 1, 7, 1952.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Witness called after summing-up at request of jury after retirement.

The appellant was convicted on an indictment charging him with carnal knowledge of a girl under sixteen. It was alleged that the offences were committed in the X-ray room of a public clinic on three afternoons, and a police witness was cross-examined to show that the clinic was a much frequented place. After the summing-up the jury, who had been enclosed for some time, sent a message to the judge saying they wanted evidence whether the clinic was empty or occupied at the material times. A doctor who had given evidence was then re-called and he stated that generally speaking no doctors or patients would be at the clinic at the material times. The jury retired again and shortly afterwards returned a verdict of Guilty. On appeal, HELD: whether evidence should be admitted after the defence had been closed to rebut matters raised for the first time by the defence was a matter for the discretion of the judge, who should apply his discretion with caution, but after the whole case had been concluded and it only remained for the jury to deliver their verdict it was not right to allow further evidence to clear up some matter which was troubling the jury.

R. v. Frost (1840) (9 C. & P. 129), discussed.

R. v. Browne (1943) (29 Cr. App. Rep. 106), applied.

AS TO THE RECALLING OF WITNESSES BY THE JUDGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, p. 170, para. 246; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 289-292, Nos. 3045-3066.

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Frost, (1840), 9 C. & P. 129; 173 E.R. 771; 14 Digest 290, 3056.
- (2) R. v. Crippen, [1911] 1 K.B. 149; 80 L.J.K.B. 290; 103 L.T. 704; 75 J.P. 141; 14 Digest 291, 3064.
- (3) R. v. Harris, [1927] 2 K.B. 587; 96 L.J.K.B. 1069; 137 L.T. 535; 91 J.P. 152; Digest Supp.
- (4) R. v. Sullivan, [1923] 1 K.B. 47; 91 L.J.K.B. 927; 126 L.T. 643; 86 J.P. 167; 14 Digest 291, 3065.
- (5) R. v. Liddle, (1928), 21 Cr. App. Rep. 3; Digest Supp.
- (6) R. v. Browne, (1943), 29 Cr. App. Rep. 106, 126; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was convicted before OLIVER, J., at Chester Assizes on an indictment containing three counts charging him with having had carnal knowledge of a girl under sixteen. The ground of the appeal was that evidence had wrongly been allowed to be given in consequence of a question by the jury after they had retired to consider their verdict.

J. J. Roberts for the appellant.

E. B. B. Richards for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

A April 7. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant was charged at Chester Assizes before OLIVER, J., with having had carnal knowledge of a girl under the age of sixteen. He was convicted and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. OLIVER, J., granted a certificate to enable him to appeal, the point of law that arises being whether the judge was right in allowing a witness to be re-called, after the summing-up and after the jury were enclosed, to deal with a question which the jury put to the judge.

B The appellant, a man of some seventy years of age, was a caretaker or porter at a clinic at Blaenau-Festiniog, and it was alleged that on three occasions he took the girl, whose age was fourteen, to the clinic and in a room there, which seems to have been the X-ray room, committed the offences charged. These visits to the clinic all took place at about 3.30 or 4 p.m., when the girl was coming home from school. The police inspector who gave evidence was cross-examined

C by counsel for the defendant, and, among other questions, these were put to him:

"Q.—So this clinic would be visible to twenty or thirty houses placed on Wynnes Road? A.—Yes. Q.—It is a public place, in other words? A.—Yes. Q.—Indeed, a much frequented place? A.—Undoubtedly. Q.—Doctors go there to attend to their patients, and there are often ten to forty patients awaiting examination at the same time? A.—I cannot say the numbers. OLIVER, J.: Do you know what the clinic hours were? A.—No. Q.—Do you know that doctors do their work in the clinic, and it is a common sight to see people waiting about for their turn to go into the clinic? A.—Yes."

E On re-examination he was asked:

"Q.—Do you know whether or not the public go into this dark room? A.—Not to my knowledge."

When the case for the prosecution was closed the appellant gave a complete denial of the charge and the judge summed up. After the jury had retired for some time, they sent a message to the judge saying that they wanted evidence

F whether the clinic would be empty or occupied at the material times. OLIVER, J., was of opinion that the question was, as he described it, of vital relevance and could have been proved by the prosecution as part of their case, and, as he has stated in his certificate,

G "being of opinion that the interests of justice demanded the evidence, and that the defendant would not be unjustly prejudiced if I allowed the evidence, I did so."

The doctor who had previously given evidence as to the girl's physical condition, was re-called, and the effect of his evidence was that at the times when the offences were alleged to have been committed no one, neither doctors nor patients, would be at the clinic unless exceptionally. That evidence having been

H given, the jury, after a very short retirement, returned a verdict of Guilty.

The question how far evidence may be called by the prosecution after the case has been closed has been discussed in many cases, but in only one in such circumstances as these. It is clear that in his discretion a judge may allow evidence to be called in rebuttal of some case set up for the first time by the defence. The case usually cited as authority on this point is R. v. Frost (1), where TINDAL, C.J., said (9 C. & P. 159):

"There can be no doubt about the general rule, that where the Crown begins a case (as it is with an ordinary plaintiff), they bring forward their evidence, and cannot afterwards support their case by calling fresh witnesses, because there may be evidence in the defence to contradict it. But if any matter arises ex improviso, which the Crown could not foresee, supposing it to be entirely new matter, which they may be able to answer only by contradictory evidence, they may give evidence in reply."

This, it will be observed, deals only with the right of the Crown to call evidence in rebuttal and does not deal with the question whether evidence can be given after the summing-up. We may also observe that the rule laid down by TINDAL, C.J., is probably in wider language than would be used at the present day. Indeed, in R. v. Crippen (2), the court said in terms that they did not propose to adopt the language of that learned judge and that it was a question for the judge at the trial to determine in his discretion whether the evidence, not having been tendered in-chief, ought to be given as rebutting evidence.

In R. v. Harris (3) the court seems to have re-considered with approval the words we have just cited from R. v. Frost (1), but that was a case in which the recorder himself called a witness towards the end of the case and examined him himself. In R. v. Sullivan (4) rebutting evidence was called after the speech of counsel for the defence and before the summing-up, apparently to rebut a suggestion in counsel's speech that a particular person had committed the offence with which the prisoner was charged. It was held that the judge had a discretionary power to act as he did and that this court would not interfere unless they were of opinion that an injustice had been caused, whereas in R. v. Liddle (5), the deputy chairman of quarter sessions adjourned a case for three days to enable evidence to be called to rebut the defence of alibi and it was held that the conviction must be quashed as this was an irregularity, the court considering that the nature of the defence was one of so common a kind that it must always be anticipated and it was not proper to take the course there adopted merely for the purpose of rebutting the defence of alibi.

None of these cases—and there are more to the like effect—is really in point in determining the question which falls for decision in this case, and the only case of which we are aware in which the point has actually arisen is R. v. Browne (6). In that case, after the summing-up and the enclosure of the jury, the jury asked the chairman to allow some evidence to be given with regard to the prisoner's state of mind, and, after some pressure, the chairman allowed the prison doctor to be called and he gave evidence on this matter. It is true that in that case there were other grounds for quashing the conviction, but the court, consisting of LORD CALDECOTE, C.J., ASQUITH, J., and CASSELS, J., were of opinion that this was an irregularity and was a reason for quashing the conviction. In the judgment of the court it is stated (29 Cr. App. Rep. 112):

"A jury is sworn to give a verdict according to the evidence. It is not sworn to give a verdict according to any suggestions or propositions which may have been followed up in the course of the trial."

We do not desire in any way to limit the discretion of a judge to admit evidence for the prosecution after the case for the defence has been closed where it becomes necessary to rebut matters which have been raised for the first time by the defence. It is much more likely that this may be necessary nowadays since prisoners are entitled to give evidence on their own behalf whereas in the days of TINDAL, C.J., such evidence could not be given. As we have said, this court in R. v. Crippen (2) declined to adopt the rule that TINDAL, C.J., laid down in all its strictness. It must be a matter for the discretion of the judge, which should be applied with caution, but it appears to us that it is quite another thing to say that, after the whole case is concluded and it remains only for the jury to return their verdict, it is right to allow further evidence to be given to clear up some matter which is troubling the jury. In the present case the evidence which was admitted was not evidence by way of rebuttal of any matter set up by the appellant. If it contradicted any evidence, it was that of the police inspector who was a witness for the prosecution.

A It is by no means uncommon for a jury to put a question to the judge after he has concluded his summing-up, whether before or after they have retired, and the usual practice is for the judge to tell the jury, if it is the fact, that no evidence on the point has been given and they must take it, therefore, that there is no evidence on it, though, if they ask a question on which evidence has been given, it is right for the judge to remind the jury of the evidence. We think this is the only safe practice, and it ought to be followed. The theory of our law is that he who affirms must prove, and, therefore, it is for the prosecutor to prove his case, and, if there is some matter which the prosecution might have proved, B but have not, after the summing-up it is too late to allow further evidence to be given. That is so whether it might have been given by one of the witnesses already called or whether it would necessitate, as in R. v. Browne (6), the calling of a fresh witness. If this were allowed, it is difficult to see what limitation could be put on it. A witness might be called who would then be open to cross-examination and the defence might then apply to call further evidence in answer.

C In the present case it is true that the question asked by the jury was most pertinent, and it is not an unfair assumption to make that their verdict depended on the answer which the doctor gave. If he had said that other people were likely to be at the clinic at the time, it is a reasonable assumption that the jury would have returned a verdict of Not Guilty. As his evidence was that generally there were no people about at the time, it is easy to see that the jury thought this was a vital point, and almost immediately after the evidence had been D given they returned a verdict of Guilty. We think they ought to have been told that the prosecution had laid before them such evidence as they had thought fit and the evidence could not now be re-opened. It is only fair to OLIVER, J., to say that he himself felt considerable doubt whether it was right to recall the witness. Being on circuit he did not have the advantage of seeing the reports. Had he been able to refer to R. v. Browne (6), he probably would not have E admitted the evidence. In any case, we think it right to lay down that, once the summing-up is concluded, no further evidence ought to be given. The jury can be instructed in reply to any question they may put on any matter on which evidence has been given, but no further evidence should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Registrar, Court of Criminal Appeal (for the appellant); Hatchett Jones & Co., agents for H. E. Jones, Blaenau-Festiniog (for the Crown).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

HARRIS v. DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Simon, Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord Morton of Henryton and Lord Tucker), March 10, 11, 12, 13, April 9, 1952.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Criminal acts other than those charged—Proof of intention—Rebuttal of possible defence—Discretion of judge to exclude.

The prosecution may adduce all proper evidence tending to prove the charge against the accused, including evidence tending to show that the accused has been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment without waiting for the accused to set up a specific defence calling for rebuttal, and evidence of similar acts, e.g., to show intention or to rebut a possible defence of accident may properly be admitted, but, though such evidence is strictly admissible, the judge has a discretion to exclude it if it merely tends to deepen suspicion against the accused and its prejudicial effect is out of proportion to its probative value.

Dicta of LORD HERSHELL, L.C., in Makin v. A.-G. for New South Wales ([1894] A.C. 65), and LORD DU PARCQ in Noor Mohamed v. R. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 370), applied.

Observations of LORD SUMNER in Thompson v. R. ([1918] A.C. 232) and of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in R. v. Sims ([1946] 1 All E.R. 701), explained.

AS TO JOINDER OF SEVERAL OFFENCES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 137, 138, paras. 179, 180; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 226-231, Nos. 2111-2174, and Digest Supps.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Makin v. A.-G. for New South Wales, [1894] A.C. 57; 63 L.J.P.C. 41; 69 L.T. 778; 58 J.P. 148; 14 Digest 371, 3924.
- (2) R. v. Ball, [1911] A.C. 47; 75 J.P. 180; sub nom. Public Prosecutions (Director) v. Ball (No. 2), 80 L.J.K.B. 691; 103 L.T. 738; 14 Digest 375, 3959.
- (3) Perkins v. Jeffery, [1915] 2 K.B. 702; 84 L.J.K.B. 1554; 113 L.T. 456; 79 J.P. 425; 14 Digest 373, 3941.
- (4) Noor Mohamed v. R., [1949] 1 All E.R. 365; [1949] A.C. 182; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Thompson v. R., [1918] A.C. 221; 87 L.J.K.B. 478; 118 L.T. 418; 82 J.P. 145; 14 Digest 360, 3810.
- (6) R. v. Mortimer, (1936), 25 Cr. App. Rep. 150; Digest Supp.
- (7) R. v. Christie, [1914] A.C. 545; sub nom. Public Prosecutions (Director) v. Christie, 83 L.J.K.B. 1097; 111 L.T. 220; 78 J.P. 321; 14 Digest 360, 3811.
- (8) R. v. Sims, [1946] 1 All E.R. 697; [1946] K.B. 531; [1947] L.J.R. 160; 175 L.T. 72; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (9) R. v. Smith, (1915), 84 L.J.K.B. 2153; 114 L.T. 239; 80 J.P. 31; 14 Digest 302, 3185.
- (10) R. v. Armstrong, [1922] 2 K.B. 555; 91 L.J.K.B. 904; 127 L.T. 221; 86 J.P. 209; 14 Digest 378, 3988.
- (11) R. v. Bywaters, (1922), 17 Cr. App. Rep. 66; 14 Digest 226, 2101.
- (12) R. v. Bond, [1906] 2 K.B. 389; 75 L.J.K.B. 693; 95 L.T. 296; 70 J.P. 424; 14 Digest 371, 3921.
- (13) Maxwell v. Public Prosecutions (Director), [1935] A.C. 309; 103 L.J.K.B. 501; 151 L.T. 477; 98 J.P. 387; Digest Supp.
- (14) R. v. Hall, [1952] 1 All E.R. 66; 116 J.P. 43.
- (15) R. v. Bailey, [1924] 2 K.B. 300; 93 L.J.K.B. 989; 132 L.T. 349; 88 J.P. 72; Digest Supp.
- (16) Stirland v. Public Prosecutions (Director), [1944] 2 All E.R. 13; [1944] A.C. 315; 113 L.J.K.B. 394; 171 L.T. 78; 109 J.P. 1; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL against a decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal (LORD GODDARD, C.J., BYRNE and PARKER, JJ.), dated Jan. 29, 1952, dismissing an appeal against conviction by the appellant.

The appellant was charged before PEARSON, J., at Leeds Assizes on an indictment containing eight counts with office-breaking and larceny between May and July, 1951. He was acquitted by the jury on the first seven counts and convicted on the eighth. Before the appellant pleaded an application was made by counsel for the defence for a separate trial on the eighth count and that that count should be tried first, counsel submitting that the depositions disclosed no case in respect of the first seven counts and that it would be prejudicial to the appellant to open those counts against him when there was only one count on which there was evidence which could be left to the jury. The learned judge refused the application on the grounds that the charges could all be properly included in one indictment, and that, in his opinion, the appellant would not be embarrassed or prejudiced by the trial of all eight counts together.

Burton, Q.C., and R. Lyons for the appellant.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.), Hylton-Foster, Q.C., and Snowden for the Crown.

The House took time for consideration.

April 9. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, this is an appeal from a decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal which comes before the House in consequence of a certificate given by the Attorney-General that the decision involves a point of law of exceptional public importance and that it is desirable in the public interest that a further appeal should be brought.

The appellant was a member of the city of Bradford police force. He was tried at the Leeds autumn assizes last November before PEARSON, J. on an indictment containing eight counts charging him with office-breaking and larceny on a series of dates in May, June, and July, 1951, by breaking into and entering the premises of a company of fruit and vegetable merchants situated in an enclosed and extensive Bradford market and stealing therefrom various sums of money. In every case the money stolen was only a part of the amount that the thief, whoever he was, might have taken. In every case the same means of access was used, and in every case the theft occurred in a period during part of which the appellant was on duty in uniform in the course of patrolling the market, and, apparently, at an hour when most of the gates to the market were closed to the general public. But, on the first seven of these occasions, there was no further evidence to associate the appellant specifically with the thefts. On the eighth occasion, however, which was between 6 and 7 o'clock on Sunday morning, July 22, the appellant, who was on solitary duty in the market as before, was found to be just outside the premises by two detective officers who had rushed to the spot on hearing, in the quarters where they were secretly waiting, the ringing of a bell actuated, without the knowledge of the appellant, by the thief's weight when he stepped on the floor of the shop. On this occasion, marked money which had been placed in the till had been abstracted, but it was not found on the appellant when he was arrested. It had been concealed in a coal-bin, not far away from where he was when first seen. The two detectives were well known to the appellant and might have been expected to be at once recognised by him, but when they entered the market, one by climbing over a gate and the other by opening it with some difficulty, though they were in the appellant's view at no great distance, he contended that he had not recognised them at first as members of the police force and so had not moved to join them. He said he thought they were market-men entering the area for some innocent purpose. By the time the two detectives had reached the premises he had disappeared from view and a little later came running up to join them. The time which elapsed between their first sight of him and his return was just sufficient to enable him to have reached the coal-bin and come back.

Before the appellant was arraigned and in the absence of the jury, his counsel asked for the severance of the indictment and urged that the charge contained in the eighth count should be tried first and separately. The learned judge applied s. 5 (3) of the Indictments Act, 1915, and ruled that there was no good reason for ordering a separate trial on the eighth count and that the case fell within r. 3 of sched. I to the Act, since the charges formed part of a series of offences of the same or a similar character. In so deciding, the learned judge was rightly exercising his discretion and no valid objection could be taken to his ruling. It was urged that the first seven counts, if taken alone, would be unsupported by any relevant evidence. But to this the answer was suggested that, if a jury took the view that the resemblance between the different thefts was so close that they must be regarded as the work of a single thief, the evidence of what happened on July 22 might be considered as identifying the criminal on all the counts. The jury, however, returned, as it was entitled to do, a verdict of Not Guilty on the first seven counts, but found the appellant Guilty on the eighth count. He appealed to the Court of Criminal Appeal against this conviction on various grounds, to one of which reference must be made hereafter. His appeal was dismissed, but, as already stated, he obtained the certificate of the Attorney-General that the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal involved a point of law of exceptional public importance and that a further appeal should be brought. The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 1 (6), while conferring this power on the Attorney-General, does not require that his certificate should indicate what is the point of law which he considers should in the public interest be thus brought for final decision before this House. In the present instance, moreover, the House was without the assistance usually derived from previous written formulation of the arguments and reasons put forward on either side. On the hearing of the appeal, however, counsel for the appellant made it clear that his main contention was that evidence as to the thefts that had occurred on the first seven occasions, when the appellant was not shown to be near the shop at the time when they occurred, could not be advanced by the prosecution or considered by the jury as part of the material to prove the charge on the eighth occasion. The Attorney-General presented the problem arising on the appeal more widely and in effect invited the House to deal with a series of authorities beginning with Makin v. A.-G. for New South Wales (1), in which limits as to the admissibility of evidence of "similar facts" had been suggested or laid down, and to decide whether the principle enunciated in Makin's case (1) should now be treated as modified or its application regarded as extended.

In my opinion, the principle laid down by LORD HERSCHELL, L.C., in Makin's case (1) remains the proper principle to apply, and I see no reason for modifying it. Makin's case (1) was a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but it was unanimously approved by the House of Lords in R. v. Ball (2) ([1911] A.C. 71) and has been constantly relied on ever since. It is, I think, an error to attempt to draw up a closed list of the sort of cases in which the principle operates. Such a list only provides instances of its general application, whereas what really matters is the principle itself and its proper application to the particular circumstances of the charge that is being tried. It is the application that may sometimes be difficult, and the particular case now before the House illustrates that difficulty. The principle as laid down by LORD HERSCHELL, L.C. ([1894] A.C. 65), is as follows:

"It is undoubtedly not competent for the prosecution to adduce evidence tending to show that the accused has been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment, for the purpose of leading to the conclusion that the accused is a person likely from his criminal conduct or character to have committed the offence for which he is being tried. On the other hand, the mere fact that the evidence adduced tends to show the commission of other crimes does not render it inadmissible if it be relevant to an issue before the jury, and it may be so relevant if it bears upon the question whether the acts alleged to constitute the crime charged in the indictment were designed or accidental, or to rebut a defence which would otherwise be open to the accused."

- A When LORD HERSCHELL speaks of evidence of other occasions in which the accused was concerned as being admissible to "rebut" a defence which would otherwise be open to the accused, he is not using the vocabulary of civil pleadings and requiring a specific line of defence to be set up before evidence is tendered which would overthrow it. If it were so, instances would arise where magistrates might be urged not to commit for trial, or it might be ruled at the trial, at the end of the prosecution's case, that enough had not been established
- B to displace the presumption of innocence, when all the time evidence properly available to support the prosecution was being withheld. AVORY, J., in giving the judgment of the Divisional Court in Perkins v. Jeffery (3), said ([1915] 2 K.B. 707):

- C "... in criminal cases, and especially in those where the justices have summary jurisdiction, the admissibility of evidence has to be determined in reference to all the issues which have to be established by the prosecution, and frequently without any indication of the particular defence that is going to be set up."

- D LORD DU PARCQ pointed out ([1949] 1 All E.R. 370) in Noor Mohamed v. R. (4), in commenting on what LORD SUMNER had said in Thompson v. R. (5) ([1918] A.C. 232):

- E "An accused person need set up no defence other than a general denial of the crime alleged. The plea of Not Guilty may be equivalent to saying: 'Let the prosecution prove its case, if it can', and, having said so much, the accused may take refuge in silence. In such a case it may appear (for instance) that the facts and circumstances of the particular offence charged are consistent with innocent intention, whereas further evidence, which incidentally shows that the accused has committed one or more other offences, may tend to prove that they are consistent only with a guilty intent. The prosecution could not be said, in their Lordships' opinion, to be 'crediting the accused with a fancy defence' if they sought to adduce such evidence."

- F LORD HERSCHELL's statement in Makin's case (1) that evidence of "similar facts" may sometimes be admissible as bearing on the question whether "the acts alleged to constitute the crime charged in the indictment were designed or accidental" deserves close analysis. Sometimes the purpose properly served by such evidence is to help to show that what happened was not an accident. If it was, the accused had nothing to do with it. Sometimes the purpose is to
- G help to show what was the intention with which the accused did the act which he is proved to have done. In a proper case, and subject to the safeguards which LORD HERSCHELL indicates, either purpose is legitimate. SCRUTTON, J., points out the distinction very clearly in Ball's case (2) ([1911] A.C. 52). Sometimes the two purposes are served by the same evidence. The substance of the matter appears to me to be that the prosecution may adduce all proper evidence which
- H tends to prove the charge. I do not understand LORD HERSCHELL's words to mean that the prosecution must withhold such evidence until after the accused has set up a specific defence which calls for rebuttal. Where, for instance, mens rea is an essential element in guilt, and the facts of the occurrence which is the subject of the charge, standing by themselves, would be consistent with mere accident, there would be nothing wrong in the prosecution seeking to establish the true situation by offering, as part of its case in the first instance, evidence of similar action by the accused at another time which would go to show that he intended to do what he did on the occasion charged and was thus acting criminally. R. v. Mortimer (6) is a good example of this. What LORD SUMNER meant in Thompson v. R. (5) when he denied ([1918] A.C. 232) the right of the prosecution to "credit the accused with fancy defences" was that evidence of similar facts involving the accused ought not to be dragged in to his prejudice without reasonable cause.

There is a second proposition which ought to be added under this head. It is not a rule of law governing the admissibility of evidence, but a rule of judicial practice followed by a judge who is trying a charge of crime when he thinks that the application of the practice is called for. LORD DU PARCQ referred to it in Noor Mohamed's case (4) immediately after the passage above quoted, when he said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 370):

" . . . in all such cases the judge ought to consider whether the evidence which it is proposed to adduce is sufficiently substantial, having regard to the purpose to which it is professedly directed, to make it desirable in the interest of justice that it should be admitted. If, so far as that purpose is concerned, it can in the circumstances of the case have only trifling weight, the judge will be right to exclude it. To say this is not to confuse weight with admissibility. The distinction is plain, but cases must occur in which it would be unjust to admit evidence of a character gravely prejudicial to the accused even though there may be some tenuous ground for holding it technically admissible. The decision must then be left to the discretion and the sense of fairness of the judge."

This second proposition flows from the duty of the judge when trying a charge of crime to set the essentials of justice above the technical rule if the strict application of the latter would operate unfairly against the accused. If such a case arose, the judge may intimate to the prosecution that evidence of "similar facts" affecting the accused, though admissible, should not be pressed because its probable effect "would be out of proportion to its true evidential value": per LORD MOULTON in R. v. Christie (7) ([1914] A.C. 559). Such an intimation rests entirely within the discretion of the judge. It is, of course, clear that evidence of "similar facts" cannot in any case be admissible to support an accusation against the accused unless they are connected in some relevant way with the accused and with his participation in the crime: see LORD SUMNER in Thompson v. R. (5) ([1918] A.C. 234). It is the fact that he was involved in the other occurrences which may negative the inference of accident or establish his mens rea by showing "system", or, again, the other occurrences may sometimes assist to prove his identity, as, for instance, in Perkins v. Jeffery (3). But evidence of other occurrences which merely tend to deepen suspicion does not go to prove guilt. This is the ground, as it seems to me, on which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council allowed the appeal in Noor Mohamed's case (5) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 370). The Board there took the view that the evidence as to the previous death of the accused's wife was not relevant to prove the charge against him of murdering another woman, and, if it was not relevant, it was at the same time highly prejudicial. It is to be noted that the Judicial Committee did not question the decision in R. v. Sims (8).

It remains to examine certain reported cases dealing with the admissibility of evidence of "similar facts" decided since Makin's case (1), to which the Attorney-General referred us. Rightly understood, these cases do not seem to me to involve any enlargement of the area within which evidence of "similar facts" might be admitted. In R. v. Smith (9) the accused was charged with murdering a woman immediately after going through a form of marriage with her by drowning her in a bath in the lodging where they were staying. Evidence was held to be rightly admitted of very similar circumstances which connected the accused with the deaths at a later date of two other women who were drowned in their baths after the accused had gone through a form of marriage with each of them in turn. In all three cases it was shown that the accused benefited by the death. In all three cases the prisoner urged the woman to take a bath and was on the premises when she prepared to do so. The ground on which the evidence of the two later occurrences was admissible was that the occurrences were so alike and the part taken by the accused in arranging what the woman would do was so similar in each case as to get rid of any suggestion of accident. The decision in Smith's case (9), therefore, involved no extension of the principle laid down in Makin's case (1). The challenged evidence was admissible both to show that what happened in the case of the first woman was not an accident and also to show what was the intention with which the accused did what he did. In R. v. Armstrong (10) the accused was indicted for the murder of his wife by administering arsenic to her. The wife was shown to have died from arsenical poisoning, but the defence urged that it was not shown that the husband had administered the poison to her, but that she had committed suicide. The accused had purchased a quantity of arsenic and made it up into a number of small packets, each containing what would constitute a fatal dose, but offered the explanation that he had purchased the poison merely to use it as a weed-killer in his garden. The prosecution called evidence to show that, eight months after the death of his wife, he secretly administered arsenic to another person. The Court of Criminal Appeal held that this evidence was admissible because it went to disprove the suggestion that he had purchased and kept arsenic for an innocent purpose. The decision in Armstrong's case (10) appears to me to involve no enlargement of the principle in Makin's case (1). LORD HEWART, C.J., rightly observed ([1922] 2 K.B. 566):

D "The fact that he was subsequently found not merely in possession of but actually using for a similar deadly purpose the very kind of poison that caused the death of his wife was evidence from which the jury might infer that that poison was not in his possession at the earlier date for an innocent purpose . . . "

E I do not find anything in the report of R. v. Bywaters (11) which could be read as extending the principle of Makin's case (1).

In R. v. Sims (8) there is a passage in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., which appears to have raised doubts in some quarters whether the principle in Makin's case (1) was being extended. The Lord Chief Justice observed ([1946] 1 All E.R. 701) that one method of approaching the relevant problem is to start with the general proposition that all evidence that is "logically probative" is admissible unless excluded by established rules, and that it would follow that evidence for the prosecution "is admissible irrespective of the issues raised by the defence". It is the words "logically probative" which have raised doubts in some minds. Such a phrase may seem to invite philosophic discussion which would be ill suited to the practical business of applying the criminal law with justice to all concerned. But I do not understand the Lord Chief Justice by the use of such a phrase to be enlarging the ambit of the principle in Makin's case (1) at all or to be disregarding the restrictions which LORD HERSCHELL indicated. In one sense, evidence of previous bad conduct, or hearsay evidence, might be regarded as having, logically, a probative value, but, of course, the judgment in Sims' case (8) is not opening the door to that. I understand the passage quoted to mean no more than what I have already formulated, viz., that the prosecution may advance proper evidence to prove its case without waiting to ascertain what is the line adopted by the defence. LORD DU PARCQ, in Noor Mohamed's case (4) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 371, 372), points out the possibility of misunderstanding the Lord Chief Justice's words and proceeds to put his own construction on them. In substance, I agree with his interpretation. There is, however, this to be added. The proper working of the criminal law in this connection depends on the due observance of both the propositions which I have endeavoured to expound in this judgment. While the prosecution may adduce all proper evidence which tends to prove the charge, it must do so with due regard to the warnings contained in the judgments of KENNEDY, J., in R. v. Bond (12) ([1906] 2 K.B. 398) and VISCOUNT SANKEY, L.C., in Maxwell v. Public Prosecutions (Director) (13) ([1935] A.C. 320). A criminal trial in this country is conducted for the purpose of deciding whether the prosecution has proved that the accused is guilty of the particular crime charged, and evidence of "similar facts" should be excluded unless such evidence has a really material bearing on the issues to be decided. This, in my opinion, is the way in which LORD SUMNER's observations in Thompson's case (5) ([1918] A.C. 232) should be regarded. It should be noted that in that case LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON (ibid., 231) was careful to insist that it would be wrong to treat the decision as "laying down any principle capable of general application". With this explanation, I see no reason to differ from the conclusion in Sims' case (8). I have already expressed my view of the explanation of the decision in Noor Mohamed's case (4). It appears to me to turn on the court's view of the relevance of the earlier facts. So regarded, it is not an authority which ought to raise doubts as to the proper application of the principle in Makin's case (1), or as disturbing the two governing propositions which I have set out above.

Lastly, I must refer to R. v. Hall (14). The way in which the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in that case was framed was manifestly in deference to the passage in Noor Mohamed's case (4), which I have already discussed. On any view, the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal was right, and I trust that the decision now being given by this House may serve to clear up some of the perplexities which Hall's case (14) showed to have arisen. It must always be remembered that every case is decided on its own facts, and expressions used, or even principles stated, when the court is considering particular facts, cannot always be applied as if they were absolute rules applicable in all circumstances.

Applying the above general propositions to the case before us, it appears to me that the only difficulty arises from the form of the summing-up. The learned judge, having decided that the eight counts should be tried together, did not warn the jury that the evidence called in support of the earlier counts did not in itself provide confirmation of the last charge. Yet, if the eighth count had been the only charge to be tried, it is difficult to see how the fact that there had been similar thefts of the same pattern before would confirm the allegation that the appellant was the thief on July 22. The eighth count raised two issues: (i) Was the money stolen on July 22? (ii) Is it proved that it was the appellant who stole it? Previous events could not confirm (i), which, indeed, was proved beyond dispute. As for (ii), the accused denied that he was the thief and the fact that someone perpetrated the earlier thefts when the appellant may have been somewhere in the market does not provide material confirmation of his identity as the thief on the last occasion. The case against him on July 22 depended on the facts of that date. Yet the jury may well have been swayed, however illogically, in reaching its verdict on the eighth count by the earlier evidence. It should have been warned of this danger, especially as Sims' case (8) shows that on an indictment containing several counts evidence may be given which supports only some of them: see the observations of LORD HEWART, C.J., in R. v. Bailey (15). One of the grounds stated in the appellant's notice of appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal was that the learned judge failed to direct the jury that it was its duty to consider each count separately and not to be influenced in its decision on the eighth count by the evidence of the earlier thefts. The learned judge did, indeed, in his summing-up, go through each count separately, but he treated the evidence as cumulative and told the jury that the main question was whether it was satisfied that the appellant "stole the money" without pointing out that the relevant considerations might be somewhat different on the different counts. True it is that the jury by its verdict distinguished between them, but the fact remains that it was not directed to consider what part of the evidence was properly of weight in deciding its verdict on the eighth count.

This leaves a final question to be determined, viz., whether the error can be regarded as immaterial in view of the proviso to s. 4 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, on the ground that no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred. If it could be said that a reasonable jury after being properly directed would, on the evidence properly admissible, without doubt have convicted on the eighth count, the proviso should be applied. This is the test laid down by this House in Stirland v. Public Prosecutions (Director) (16). It is sufficient to say that, in the present instance, it would be going too far to make this assumption and the appeal must, therefore, be allowed. Section 44 (3) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, gives this House a discretion, when a criminal appeal is determined in favour of the accused, to direct payment out of local funds of costs to meet expenses incurred by him in the appeal to this House or in the prosecution of his appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal. It is not the practice of the Court of Criminal Appeal to grant a successful appellant costs of an appeal to it save in exceptional circumstances, and, so far as that court is concerned, there is no special reason for disturbing that practice on the present occasion. But I think that the appellant should receive his taxed costs in respect of his appeal to this House. The section requires that this should be done by directing the proper payment out of local funds, but I understand that the Director of Public Prosecutions has already met, or agreed to meet, much of the appellant's expenses, and the effect of the House's order will, therefore, be to require local funds to bear only the balance, if any.

My Lords, my noble and learned friend, LORD PORTER, who is unable to be present today, authorises me to say that he agrees in all respects with this opinion.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree with the principles stated by the noble viscount on the Woolsack as to the admissibility of evidence, but I find myself unable to agree with your Lordships' application of those principles to the facts of the case. I agree with your Lordships that the discretion of PEARSON, J., to try the eight counts together ought not to be disturbed. As I understand it, your Lordships are of opinion that the evidence on counts 1 to 7 was relevant on the eighth count, but so slightly relevant that it should have been excluded by the judge. I agree with the principle that the judge at the trial has a discretion to exclude evidence which, though strictly speaking admissible, is only slightly relevant and, if it relates to former offences by the appellant, may have a prejudicial effect out of proportion to its relevance, but I do not agree that that principle is applicable to the facts of this case and I am of opinion that the summing-up of PEARSON, J., and the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal were right.

There is, in my opinion, no question of general importance in this appeal. The only question is: Do the facts which were proved as to the thefts referred to in counts 1 to 7 tend so slightly to implicate the accused in the crime in July with which he was charged in the eighth count that they ought to have been excluded? The facts on the eight occasions were, undoubtedly, similar. The premises were the same. The method of entry to the premises was the same. The money taken was less than the money on the premises. The appellant might have broken into the premises while on duty as a police constable when money was stolen, and when he was on leave no thefts took place. The only difference in the July facts was that the appellant was proved then to be close by the premises directly after the alarm was given in circumstances of suspicion. It is, in my opinion, important to observe that there was no direct evidence that the appellant broke in and committed the theft in July. The evidence, of course, was much more cogent than the evidence of May and June, but it was not conclusive and was really only a much stronger case of opportunity. It is true that the admission of the evidence of the facts of May and June involves the suggestion that the appellant committed crimes other than the particular crime on which ex hypothesi he was being tried, and, if the only relevance of the facts as to counts 1 to 7 was that he had committed crimes on those occasions, I should agree that evidence of such facts would be inadmissible. But that is not the only relevance of these facts. Their relevance consists and consists only, in my opinion, in the similarities which existed between the facts of May and June and the facts of July. It is one thing to prove that the appellant has committed a number of different crimes on different occasions; it may be a totally different thing to adduce evidence which tends to show that he has committed the same sort of offence in the same circumstances on several occasions. I do not understand your Lordships to hold that the evidence of what happened in July was inadmissible or should have been excluded on any of the counts 1 to 7, and, if that is so, it could, in my opinion, only be because of the same similarities in the evidence, from which it might be inferred that the accused stole the money on the first seven occasions although there was no direct evidence that he was, in fact, present when the money was stolen on any one of those occasions. The question may be tested in this way: Can it be said that no jury could reasonably find that one person committed all eight thefts? In my opinion, the same similarity must be equally relevant whether it is adduced on one count as on the others.

My Lords, I desire to add that I do not agree with the observations made by LORD DU PARCQ in stating the advice tendered to His Majesty in Council in Noor Mohamed v. R. (4) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 371), in which he criticised the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Sims (8). I do not agree with that criticism, which was not in any way necessary to the decision of the Noor Mohamed case (4). I see nothing wrong in approaching the question what evidence is admissible by considering, first, the general rule as to admissibility and, secondly, what are the exceptions to it. No one doubts that evidence of previous or subsequent bad or criminal conduct on the part of the accused is to be excluded unless it is relevant to some issue in the case, but it is for the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused, and the prosecution must, in proving facts which are more consistent than not with the guilt of the accused, negative "a defence which would otherwise be open to the accused" to use the words of LORD HERSCHELL; L.C., in Makin's case (1) ([1894] A.C. 57). It is probably impossible to give an exhaustive definition of the kind of defences which may be open to a prisoner or of the kind of bad or criminal conduct which may be relevant to the question of his guilt on the particular charge on which he is being tried. The issue to which the evidence in question was, in my opinion, relevant was whether the appellant was near the premises in July for an innocent purpose or not. For these reasons I agree with the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I agree with the speech which has been delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I desire only to add that, in my view, evidence as to the thefts which occurred on the first seven occasions was not admissible for the purpose of the trial of the appellant on the eighth count, because the appellant was not proved to have been near the shop or even in the market, at the time when these thefts occurred. It is, however, quite clear that the learned judge invited the jury to take that evidence into account when considering the eighth count. In making these observations, I do not regard myself as differing in any way from the speech with which I have just expressed my agreement. I make them only for the purpose of explaining why I cannot accept the views which have just been expressed by my noble and learned friend, LORD OAKSEY.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, for the reasons which have been stated by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack I concur in the motion which he has proposed. I agree with my noble and learned friend, LORD MORTON OF HENRY-TON, that the evidence with regard to the first seven occasions was irrelevant to the charge on the eighth count, but was left to the jury as relevant.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Sidney Torrance & Co., agents for J. Levi, Leeds (for the appellant); Director of Public Prosecutions (for the Crown).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

EAST INDIA TRADING CO., INC. v. CARMEL EXPORTERS AND IMPORTERS, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), March 27, April 8, 1952.]

Money—Currency—Rate of exchange—Damages for breach of contract—Foreign judgment sued on in the United Kingdom—Rate at date of judgment.

On May 11, 1950, following a breach of contract by the defendants on June 13, 1949, the plaintiffs obtained final judgment against the defendants in the Supreme Court of the State of New York. On Sept. 20, 1949, between the date of the breach and that of the final judgment, the rate of exchange between the United States of America and the United Kingdom was altered from $4.03 to $2.80 to the pound sterling. In an action on the New York judgment, HELD: since the plaintiffs had sued on the judgment and not on the breach of contract, they were entitled to judgment for the amount of the judgment debt converted into sterling at the rate of exchange at the date of the judgment ($2.80 to the pound).

Scott v. Bevan (1831) (2 B. & Ad. 78) and Madeleine Vionnet et Cie. v. Wills ([1939] 4 All E.R. 136), applied.

AS TO DAMAGES IN FOREIGN CURRENCY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 150, para. 191; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 17, pp. 158-161, Nos. 596-614.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Scott v. Bevan, (1831), 2 B. & Ad. 78; 9 L.J.O.S.K.B. 152; 109 E.R. 1073; 35 Digest 174, 44.
- (2) Di Ferdinando v. Simon, Smits & Co., Ltd., [1920] 3 K.B. 409; 89 L.J.K.B. 1039; 124 L.T. 117; 35 Digest 175, 52.
- (3) Lebeaupin v. Crispin (R.) & Co., [1920] 2 K.B. 714; 89 L.J.K.B. 1024; 124 L.T. 124; 35 Digest 175, 51.
- (4) Nouvion v. Freeman, (1888), 37 Ch.D. 244; affd. H.L., (1889), 15 App. Cas. 1; 59 L.J.Ch. 337; 62 L.T. 189; 11 Digest 454, 1108.
- (5) Williams v. Jones, (1845), 13 M. & W. 628; 14 L.J.Ex. 145; 4 L.T.O.S. 318; 153 E.R. 262; 11 Digest 466, 1220.
- (6) Madeleine Vionnet et Cie. v. Wills, [1939] 4 All E.R. 136; [1940] 1 K.B. 72; 109 L.J.K.B. 22; 161 L.T. 311; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Cummings v. London Bullion Co., Ltd., [1952] 1 All E.R. 383.

ACTION on a judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of New York.

The plaintiffs claimed £11,703 3s. 5d., being the sterling equivalent of a sum for which they had obtained final judgment for a breach of contract in the Supreme Court of the State of New York on May 11, 1950, calculated at $2.80 to the pound, being the rate of exchange at the date of the New York judgment. A master gave the plaintiffs leave to sign judgment for £8,131 4s. 9d., the sterling equivalent of the judgment debt at $4.03 to the pound, being the rate of exchange at June 13, 1949, the date of the breach of contract, and gave the defendants leave to defend the action as to the balance of £3,571 18s. 8d., the issue being whether $4.03 or $2.80 to the pound sterling was the correct rate of exchange at which the amount of the judgment debt should be converted into sterling.

Mocatta, Q.C., and P. H. R. Bristow for the plaintiffs.

S. Pascoe Hayward, Q.C., and I. H. Jacob for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8. SELLERS, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs seek to enforce a judgment which they obtained on May 11, 1950, in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, United States of America, by claiming in this action the sterling equivalent of the amount in dollars of the judgment and costs at the rate of exchange prevailing at the date of the foreign judgment. The sole question for decision is whether the conversion of the amount in dollars of the foreign judgment and costs into pounds sterling, in which alone the English judgment can be given, is to be made at the rate of exchange ruling at the time of the foreign judgment or at some other time. On behalf of the defendants it is said that the question is open as it has not been the subject of a binding decision, and it is alleged that in the circumstances of this case and on principle the conversion should be made at the rate of exchange ruling, not at the date of the foreign judgment, but at the date when the defendants were in breach of their contract with the plaintiffs which gave rise to this liability.

By an award made on Aug. 2, 1949, in an arbitration between the parties in New York the defendants were held to have broken a contract dated Mar. 21, 1949, for the sale of some goods to the plaintiffs by failing to ship or deliver the goods, and the date of the breach was found to be June 13, 1949. There was an appeal, and the award was upheld on Dec. 7, 1949. In the interval, on Sept. 20, 1949, the rate of exchange which had previously at all material times been United States of America $4.03 to the pound sterling became $2.80 to the pound, and has remained so up to the present time. Judgment has already been entered for £8,131 4s. 9d. on the basis prevailing before the devaluation of sterling, and this is sufficient if the rate of exchange has to be calculated as on June 13, 1949, or at some date before Sept. 20, 1949. But a further sum of £3,571 18s. 8d. is due if the judgment is to be entered in this action at a rate of exchange which will give the plaintiffs the amount in dollars equivalent to the amount of the American judgment on May 11, 1950.

As far back as 1831 in Scott v. Bevan (1) a claim was made to enforce in this country a judgment obtained by the plaintiff in Jamaica. The headnote is as follows:

"In an action brought in England to recover the value of a given sum Jamaica currency, upon a judgment obtained in that island; the value is that sum in sterling money which the currency would have produced according to the actual rate of exchange between Jamaica and England at the date of the judgment."

It appears that the only point taken, as learned counsel for the defendant indicated in that case, was whether the rate of exchange to be applied was the actual rate ruling between the two countries or the par rate of exchange, and, therefore, it is, perhaps, strictly accurate to say that it does not decide the point now in issue. But the original liability of the defendant was for damages for some breach of duty established in the Jamaica action, and the judgment quantified the amount due to the plaintiff. Neither LORD TENTERDEN, C.J., in his judgment nor the other judges nor any of the distinguished counsel seem to have questioned that the material date for calculating the conversion was the date of the Jamaican judgment. Neither has that date been criticised when the case has been referred to on occasions since, as one might have expected from the distinguished judges who have considered it if they had thought the decision wrong in this respect, although it is, I think, correct to say that the point has never called for express consideration. I am omitting a criticism of McCARDIE, J. (in Lebeaupin v. Crispin (R.) & Co. (3)), based on what would seem to be a misreading of the decision.

The plaintiffs here base their claim on the foreign judgment. That is the cause of action and it creates the debt, they allege, which is enforceable by action in this country. They rely on a statement of the law expressed in r. 86 in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 403, which is in these terms:

"Subject to the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, a valid foreign judgment in personam may be enforced by an action for the amount due under it if the judgment is (i) for a debt, or definite sum of money; and (ii) final and conclusive, but not otherwise."

None of the exceptions is relevant, but at p. 410 there is set out a sub-rule:

"A valid foreign judgment does not of itself extinguish the original cause of action in respect of which the judgment was given."

It was alleged and relied on by the defendants, but not conceded by the plaintiffs, that, instead of suing on the foreign judgment, the plaintiffs could have proceeded in this country on the original cause of action, namely, the breach of contract. In that case the damages would be assessed at the date of the breach of contract if the action were successful: see Di Ferdinando v. Simon, Smits & Co., Ltd. (2). The defendants submitted that, that being so, the court should hold that the date of the breach of contract should in both cases be held to be the date when the rate of exchange had to be applied, otherwise it would vary according to which course the plaintiffs took, either to enforce the judgment obtained in New York, or to start a fresh action here. For myself, I see less objection to a plaintiff who has obtained judgment rather than a defendant who is in default being in a position to select the most advantageous course. A rigid rule may have the advantage of certainty, but I apprehend that in some circumstances it might prove advantageous to the party in default, and equally disadvantageous to the innocent party. Rates of exchange may in a given period vary, first in one direction and then in the opposite, and it may be that the fluctuations of the exchange market might give scope to either of the parties concerned to turn it to his advantage by expediting or delaying the steps he takes. MCCARDIE, J., envisaged this in Lebeaupin v. R. Crispin & Co. (3) ([1920] 2 K.B. 722). But I do not think the advantage would always be as one-sided as the learned judge there indicated. It is, however, not open to me to apply some sort of equitable rule which would seek to ensure the fairest award when the parties' dealings have been affected by variations in the rate of exchange. The American judgment was a judgment for a fixed sum, and was final and conclusive. In Nouvion v. Freeman (4) in the Court of Appeal, COTTON, L.J., stated the law in this way in his judgment (37 Ch.D. 250):

"What is required in England in order that a foreign judgment may be sued upon here as giving a good cause of action? A foreign judgment does not, in the view of an English court, merge the original cause of action, but if the party likes to proceed here on his original cause of action, he may do so, notwithstanding the foreign judgment. If he elects to proceed on the foreign judgment, then he must show that the matter has been adjudicated upon by a competent court, and that the adjudication is final and conclusive."

In the same case in the House of Lords LORD HERSCHELL put the matter in this way (15 App. Cas. 8):

"Now, my Lords, there can be no doubt that in the courts of this country effect will be given to a foreign judgment. It is unnecessary to inquire upon what principle the courts proceed in giving effect to such a judgment, and in treating it as sufficient to establish the debt. Reliance was placed upon a dictum by PARKE, B., and ALDERSON, B., in the case of Williams v. Jones (5) (13 M. & W. 633) where the law is thus stated: 'Where a court of competent jurisdiction has adjudicated a certain sum to be due from one person to another, a legal obligation arises to pay that sum, on which an action of debt to enforce the judgment may be maintained'. But it was conceded, and necessarily conceded, by the learned counsel for the appellant, that a judgment, to come within the terms of the law as properly laid down, must be a judgment which results from an adjudication of a court of competent jurisdiction, such judgment being final and conclusive."

It may be an open question for a higher court whether a debt expressed in foreign currency must, in litigation in this country, be converted into sterling with reference to the rate of exchange prevailing on the day when the debt was payable or with reference to the day of the judgment in the English court. That was not the contention on behalf of the defendants, for in the present case the result would be the same. In the case of the enforcement of a foreign judgment I would follow the most recent decision of Madeleine Vionnet et Cie. v. Wills (6), which decides that the correct date on which to convert a debt in foreign currency sued for in this country is the date on which the debt became due. This is in accord with Scott v. Bevan (1) which, after all these years, should be followed unless there are impelling reasons to the contrary. This decision also makes for uniformity between a foreign judgment which can be registered and one which has to be enforced by action. By the Foreign Judgments (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act, 1933, it is provided by s. 2 (3):

"Where the sum payable under a judgment which is to be registered is expressed in a currency other than the currency of the United Kingdom, the judgment shall be registered as if it were a judgment for such sum in the currency of the United Kingdom as, on the basis of the rate of exchange prevailing at the date of the judgment of the original court, is equivalent to the sum so payable."

The American judgment could not be registered under that Act, there being no reciprocal arrangement between the two countries, but the principle which I have applied here gives the same result as a registration under the Act would have given.

The Exchange Control Act, 1947, has no application to this case. No question arises here such as was the subject of decision in Cummings v. London Bullion Co., Ltd. (7) to which I was referred by learned counsel. In my judgment, authority and good reason are against the defendants' contention that the date of the breach of the contract should be taken as the material date. The American judgment is the immediate source from which the defendants' liability flows in the present action, and no earlier date can be called into consideration. I give judgment for the plaintiffs for £3,571 18s. 8d. together with interest from May 11, 1950, on this amount only at 4 per cent. which is the rate current in our courts, although I understand that a higher rate of interest rules in the American tribunal where the judgment was originally obtained.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors: Richards, Butler & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Fink, Proudfoot & Waters (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re AN APPLICATION BY MARLY LABORATORY, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), March 26, 27, 1952.]

Chose in Action—Rights included in chose—Rights of party to apply for costs of action.

A Costs—Party not represented by counsel—Company—Jurisdiction to award costs.

Judgment—Order—Correction—Accidental slip or omission of any party to proceedings—Right to apply for correction—R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 11.

B On an application by M.L., Ltd. for registration of a trade mark of which it was the proprietor, the proceedings on its behalf before the hearing officer acting on behalf of the Comptroller-General of Trade Marks were conducted by G., its managing director. The hearing officer having decided that the trade mark might be properly registered, the opponents gave notice of appeal. So as to have the right of audience on appeal, G. procured an assignment to himself of the trade mark and all choses in action relating to it, and he was added as a party to the proceedings. The appeal was dismissed by the judge, and the opponents were ordered to pay G.'s costs of the motion on appeal, but the order for costs contained no reference to the costs of M.L., Ltd. An application by G. to the judge for an order that the costs of M.L., Ltd. should be treated as his costs was refused, and the judge held that, although the failure to include in the order for costs any reference to M.L., Ltd. was a slip on the part of the court which could be corrected under R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 11, he had no jurisdiction to amend the order by making provision for the costs of M.L., Ltd. unless M.L., Ltd. applied by counsel for the amendment.

C HELD: (i) a chose in action did not include the right of a party to an action to make an application to the judge for an order for costs, and, therefore, under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 136 (1), G. was not entitled by reason of the assignment to apply to the judge for an order that the costs of M.L., Ltd. should be treated as his costs.

E (ii) an order for costs could have been made in favour of M.L., Ltd., notwithstanding the fact that it was not represented by counsel at the hearing of the appeal.

F (iii) any party to the proceedings was entitled to apply under R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 11, to have an accidental slip or omission put right, and, therefore, on an application to that effect by G., the order for costs could be amended by including therein a direction that the costs of M.L., Ltd. of the motion of appeal should be paid by the opponents.

FOR R.S.C., ORD. 28, r. 11, see THE ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1951, p. 465.

G APPEAL by the applicant, Friedrich Josef Gurtner, from an order of LLOYD-JACOB, J., dated Dec. 17, 1951, whereby he refused to vary an order for costs made by him on Jan. 24, 1951, in proceedings in respect of the registration of a trade mark.

H The applicant was the managing director of a company, Marly Laboratory, Ltd., which applied for registration of a trade mark of which it was the proprietor. The application was opposed by Morny, Ltd., but the hearing officer, Mr. W. M. Faulkner, acting for the Comptroller-General of Trade Marks, decided that the mark might be properly registered. The proceedings before the hearing officer were conducted by the applicant on behalf of Marly Laboratory, Ltd., and, after the opponents, Morny, Ltd., had given notice of appeal from the decision of the hearing officer, the applicant procured an assignment to himself by deed of all the interest which Marly Laboratory, Ltd. had in the trade mark and the business connected with it, including all choses in action relative to the subject-matter assigned, so as to have the right of audience before the High Court. On notice being given of the assignment, he was added as a party to the proceedings. Marly Laboratory, Ltd. remained a party, but did not appear by counsel before the judge. LLOYD-JACOB, J., dismissed the appeal from the order of the hearing officer, and, by an order dated Jan. 24, 1951, directed that the applicant's costs of the motion should be paid by the opponents. The order contained no reference to the costs of Marly Laboratory, Ltd. On Apr. 9, 1951, an appeal by the opponents from the order of LLOYD-JACOB, J., dismissing the appeal from the decision of the hearing officer was dismissed by the Court of Appeal. On taxation of costs, the taxing master refused to allow costs incurred by Marly Laboratory, Ltd., on the ground that they were not part of the applicant's costs. The applicant then applied to the learned judge for an order varying the order of Jan. 24, 1951, by directing that the costs of Marly Laboratory, Ltd. should be treated as his costs, but his application was refused by LLOYD-JACOB, J. In his judgment the learned judge said that the failure to include any reference to the costs of Marly Laboratory, Ltd. in his order of Jan. 24, 1951, was an omission, a slip on the part of the court, which the court could correct under R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 11, but that he could not make an amendment under r. 11 unless someone properly authorised on the company's behalf invited him to do so.

The applicant appeared in person.

Whitford for the opponents.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., stated the facts, and continued: I do not take the view that, in the first instance, an order for costs could not have been made in favour of Marly Laboratory, Ltd. without the company being present by counsel to ask for them. In other words, on Jan. 24, 1951, though Marly Laboratory, Ltd. was not there, it would have been competent for the judge, and, obviously, in accordance with his intention, to order that the costs of the motion, properly incurred by Marly Laboratory, Ltd., should be paid by the opponents. It would be absurd to suggest that Marly Laboratory, Ltd. would necessarily have to appear by counsel merely to ask for costs.

Then the question is raised whether, the mistake (viz., the omission) having been made, anyone other than Marly Laboratory, Ltd. can apply under R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 11, to have it put right. In my view, any party to the action is entitled to come to the court and draw the attention of the court to the fact (if it be the fact) that a slip has been made in the order, even though the putting right of the slip does not, in fact, benefit, and may even injure, the party making the application. I think that counsel for the opponents was disposed to agree that (to take the extreme case) it would have been open to the opponents to make the application on the ground that a mistake had been made of which they did not desire to take advantage. In this case the applicant made the application, but sought a different kind of order. He claimed that the proper costs incurred by Marly Laboratory, Ltd. ought now to be part of his costs, and he relied on the assignment to him of all the interest which that company had in the trade mark, and also on the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 136 (1). As regards that, I think that the applicant's argument is erroneous and that it rests on the hypothesis (which is also erroneous) that a chose in action includes the right of a party to an action to make an application to the judge for an order for costs which the judge may or may not direct, and, therefore, I do not think that the applicant's application was correctly made. But I think that there is no objection to the applicant saying: "I am a party. I am in fact interested, and I say that there has been a slip which ought to be put right, in favour, not of me, but of another party, namely, Marly Laboratory, Ltd." I think that, in all the circumstances, the judge erred in thinking that he had no jurisdiction to do what he plainly would have liked to do and intended to do. The order which I think should be made is that the order of Jan. 24, 1951, should be treated as amended by including in it a direction for taxation of the party and party costs of Marly Laboratory, Ltd. of the motion, with a direction that they be paid by the opponents or set off.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

MORRIS, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: J. D. Langton & Passmore (for the opponents).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. SUMMERS.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Ormerod and Parker, JJ.), April 1, 1952.]

Criminal Law—Trial—Direction to jury—Use of expression “reasonable doubt.”

Per curiam: In summing up a criminal case to the jury it is advisable not to direct them that, if they have a “reasonable doubt” about the guilt of the prisoner, they should acquit him. It is difficult to define what is a “reasonable doubt”, and an explanation of the phrase tends to result in confusion rather than clarity. The jury should be directed that they should not convict unless they are satisfied by the evidence given by the prosecution that the offence has been committed, so that, when they give their verdict, they can be sure that it is a right one.

AS TO JUDGE'S SUMMING UP, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, p. 170, para. 247; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 296-303, Nos. 3124-3195.

APPEAL against conviction and sentence.

The appellant was convicted at Surrey Quarter Sessions of stealing copper from a mausoleum and was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. When arrested and questioned, he said: “How did you find out I was in that? There is no need to put me up for identification . . . I know I am bound to be picked out”. In summing up the chairman told the jury that, if they had a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the appellant, they should acquit him. He then explained what he meant by “reasonable doubt”. The Court of Criminal Appeal in dismissing the appeal made certain observations on the use of the expression “reasonable doubt” with which this report is concerned.

Buckland for the appellant.

Sir John Cameron for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the judgment of the court in which he stated the facts and continued: There is no ground for interfering with the conviction so far as the evidence is concerned, but the learned single judge gave leave to appeal because of a passage in the summing up. The chairman of quarter sessions said:

“We have used the words ‘reasonable doubt’. Some people have difficulty in understanding that. I feel sure you will not have any difficulty in understanding it. If you come to the conclusion on the evidence when you are dealing with these conversations: ‘This might have happened, or it might not’, that is a reasonable doubt. I do not want you to bring yourself into that frame of mind if your real view is: ‘It is just barely possible.’ . . . Look at it from the point of view of ordinary people, as if you were considering something in your ordinary lives. Would you, as ordinary people, if this had been something you had been told about by friends of yours, be inclined to believe them or disbelieve them? That is the sort of thing which is meant by ‘reasonable doubt’. It is nothing to do with lawyers' jargon; it is merely the sort of judgment which the ordinary man of the world brings to bear on his own affairs, and look at it from that point of view."

In the opinion of the court, no jury hearing that would think that the learned chairman was saying any more than: "If you have a doubt in this matter, remember the case is not proved and you must acquit".

I have never yet heard any court give a real definition of what is a "reasonable doubt", and it would be very much better if that expression was not used. Whenever a court attempts to explain what is meant by it, the explanation tends to result in confusion rather than clarity. It is far better, instead of using the words "reasonable doubt" and then trying to say what is a reasonable doubt, to say to a jury: "You must not convict unless you are satisfied by the evidence given by the prosecution that the offence has been committed". The jury should be told that it is not for the prisoner to prove his innocence, but for the prosecution to prove his guilt, and that it is their duty to regard the evidence and see if it satisfies them so that they can feel sure, when they give their verdict, that it is a right one.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Registrar, Court of Criminal Appeal (for the appellant); Solicitor, Metropolitan Police (for the Crown).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re GOVERNMENT OF INDIA AND MUBARAK ALI AHMED.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., and Parker, J.), April 4, 1952.]

Extradition—Fugitive offender—Fugitive from Republic of India—Operation of Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881 (c. 69), s. 5—Preservation of existing provisions of Imperial statutes—India (Consequential Provision) Act, 1949 (c. 92), s. 1 (1).

Extradition—Fugitive offender—Political offence—Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881 (c. 69), s. 10.

The applicant, a native of Pakistan, was being tried in India on charges of forgery and fraud when he broke his bail and fled to Pakistan whence he came to England where he was arrested on a provisional warrant issued by a metropolitan magistrate on the application of the government of India. After hearing legal submissions the magistrate made an order under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 5, for the applicant's detention in custody pending his return to India to answer the charges made against him. On an application by the applicant for a writ of habeas corpus,

HELD: the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, was in force as between India and Great Britain on Jan. 26, 1950, when India became a republic, and it was continued in force by virtue of s. 1 (1) of the India (Consequential Provision) Act, 1949, and, therefore, the magistrate had jurisdiction to make the order for the applicant's return.

Per LORD GODDARD, C.J.: If the offence with which a man is charged is really a political offence the court would apply the same rules under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, as are laid down in s. 3 (1) of the Extradition Act, 1870, and would, no doubt, refuse to make an order returning him to the country seeking his return.

AS TO RETURN OF FUGITIVE OFFENDERS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 14, p. 544, para. 1046, and pp. 549-551, paras. 1057-1060; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 24, pp. 889-891, Nos. 147-155.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Amand v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs, [1942] 2 All E.R. 381; sub nom. Amand v. Home Secretary & Minister of Defence of Royal Netherlands Government, [1943] A.C. 147; sub nom. R. v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs & Minister of Defence of the Royal Netherlands Government. Ex p. Amand, 111 L.J.K.B. 657; 167 L.T. 177; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Re Castioni, [1891] 1 Q.B. 149; 60 L.J.M.C. 22; 64 L.T. 344; 55 J.P. 328; 24 Digest 873, 36.

APPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus and for the discharge of an order for the detention of the applicant pending his return to India to take his trial on charges of forgery and fraud, made on Mar. 21, 1952, by a metropolitan magistrate, sitting at Bow Street Magistrate's Court, under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881. In an affidavit the applicant set out the following grounds in support of his application: (i) that the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, was of no effect as between the republic of India and this country; (ii) that there was no substance in the charges made against him in that all the information was available to the complainants in 1946, that their differences were settled by his paying an agreed sum, and that no further action was taken until the eve of the invasion of Hyderabad by India when the present proceedings were commenced in order to prevent the applicant from taking any active part in the events of that time; (iii) that the proceedings were based on political considerations only, that since June, 1948, efforts had been made to keep him in custody on political grounds, and that his family had also been persecuted; (iv) that he was publicly branded as a political spy for Pakistan and that he would not be given a fair trial by any jury in the presidency of Bombay; (v) that, if returned to Bombay to stand trial, he would be unable to defend himself properly by reason of his inability to call the necessary witnesses who were in Pakistan and would not go to India; (vi) and that he had no funds in India for his defence, all his property there having been confiscated.

Sir Godfrey Russell Vick, Q.C., and Aarvold for the applicant.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a motion for a writ of habeas corpus to bring up and discharge the applicant, Mubarak Ali Ahmed, who is at present the subject of an order under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, made by a metropolitan magistrate sitting at Bow Street Magistrate's Court, returning him to India there to take his trial on a charge of forgery. The application is made partly under s. 5 of the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, which gives a person who has been ordered by a magistrate to be returned the right to apply for a writ of habeas corpus, and partly under s. 10 of the Act which gives power to a superior court in this country to discharge an offender where, to use the words of the marginal note, the case is frivolous or the return would be unjust.

The applicant, who claims to be a native of Pakistan, was arrested in the republic of India and was there charged with the offence of forgery and fraud. He was committed for trial, and after the trial had proceeded for two or three days he defaulted on his bail and fled from India. He fled first to Pakistan. We are told—it is not for this court to go into the matter, because it only concerns Pakistan and India—that it is thought doubtful whether at the present time extradition proceedings lie between Pakistan and India. The applicant did not stay in Pakistan, where he might have been safe. He came to this country and was arrested here, and the only substantial question is whether or not the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, still applies as between this country and the republic of India.

By s. 12 of the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, that Act could be applied to any of Her Majesty's dominions by an Order in Council, and we were told that an Order in Council was made in 1904 (S.R. & O., 1904, No. 318), applying the Act to India which was then a part of the sovereign's dominions. Until India became an independent republic on Jan. 26, 1950, there was no question that the Act was in force so that its provisions could be applied to a person who was alleged to be a fugitive offender from India and was arrested in this country. In 1947 Dominion status was conferred on India, and the constitution which had hitherto applied in India no longer applied after Jan. 26, 1950, when India set up its own constitution and became an independent republic, but remained a member of the Commonwealth. It may be—I speak with diffidence—that it is an unusual situation that a republic can be a member of the Commonwealth, but so it is. That is recognised by Her Majesty and this court takes notice of it, but we need not go into those points because, in anticipation of India becoming a republic, on Dec. 16, 1949, the Imperial Parliament passed the India (Consequential Provision) Act, 1949.

The first point made on behalf of the applicant is that the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, no longer applies as between this country and India, and, therefore, if a fugitive offender gets to this country from India he cannot be handed over. The answer to that seems to be that by the clear words of the India (Consequential Provision) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), it is provided that all Acts, rules of law, and so forth, which were in existence at the time when India became a republic, are to remain in force. The words of s. 1 are:

“(1) On and after the date of India's becoming a republic, all existing law, that is to say, all law which, whether being a rule of law or a provision of an Act of Parliament or of any other enactment or instrument whatsoever, is in force on that date or has been passed or made before that date and comes into force thereafter, shall, until provision to the contrary is made by the authority having power to alter that law and subject to the provisions of sub-s. (3) of this section, have the same operation in relation to India, and to persons and things in any way belonging to or connected with India, as it would have had if India had not become a republic . . . (3) His Majesty may by Order in Council make provision for such modification of any existing law to which this Act extends as may appear to him to be necessary or expedient in view of India's becoming a republic while remaining a member of the Commonwealth, and sub-s. (1) of this section shall have effect in relation to any such law as modified by such an order save in so far as the contrary intention appears in the order. An Order in Council under this section—(a) may be made either before or after India becomes a republic, and may be revoked or varied by a subsequent Order in Council; and (b) shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.”

It seems to me clear that that Act, which was passed in direct contemplation of India becoming a republic within some five weeks of its passing, preserves in force all the laws of this country relating to India which were in force at the date of the republic coming into existence. That is the only possible construction which can be put on s. 1, and it seems to me extremely likely that the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, was one of the Acts which Parliament had in mind when preserving the operation of existing statutory provisions, but we need not consider that. All we have to do is to construe the provisions of the Act of 1949. It is clear that the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, was in force as between India and this country at the time when India became a republic, and it remained in force by the joint operation of the Act of 1881 and an Order in Council of 1904 which is still in force. In my opinion, therefore, the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, is in full force and effect between this country and India, the magistrate had jurisdiction to inquire into the matter, and there is no complaint to be made on that ground that an order was made.

Secondly, the application is to this court as a superior court under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, s. 10. We have allowed fairly full argument on this matter because, since the decision of Amand v. Secretary of State for Home Affairs (1), it is very doubtful whether any appeal can lie from this court, the proceeding coming within the definition of a criminal cause or matter. The application to this court is that the court refuse to order the fugitive to be given up and it is made under s. 10 which provides:

A "Where it is made to appear to a superior court that by reason of the trivial nature of the case, or by reason of the application for the return of a fugitive not being made in good faith in the interests of justice or otherwise, it would, having regard to the distance, to the facilities for communication, and to all the circumstances of the case, be unjust or oppressive or too severe a punishment to return the fugitive either at all or until the expiration of a certain period, such court may discharge the fugitive, either absolutely or on bail, or order that he shall not be returned until after the expiration of the period named in the order, or may make such other order in the premises as to the court seems just."

B

Affidavits have been filed in which it is suggested that the applicant is being persecuted as a political offender. I am quite sure that in a proper case the court would apply the same rules with regard to applications under the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, as it does under s. 3 (1) of the Extradition Act, 1870. If it appeared that the offence with which the prisoner was charged was in effect a political offence, no doubt this court would refuse to return him. The sort of case that has arisen (e.g., Re Castioni (2)) is where a man has been charged with murder and it is shown that there was a revolution in the country where he was and that the alleged murder was committed in the course of the revolution and was regarded as a political matter. In such a case extradition has been refused. The present applicant was standing his trial on a charge of forgery. It may be that, rightly or wrongly—it is a matter into which this court cannot inquire—he was regarded by the Indian government as a troublesome political personage who could be dealt with under the Indian Public Security Act, but this court finds that the applicant was actually on trial in India when he fled. It would be astonishing if in those circumstances this court said they would not hand him back because it would be unjust or oppressive to do so. He was allowed bail during the course of the trial and broke his bail, and we are now asked to refuse to send him back to India because, it is said, he will not get a fair trial. I think it would be an impossible position for this court to take up to say that they would not return a person for trial to a country which is a member of the Commonwealth and where it is known that courts of justice have been presided over by Indian judges for very many years because we thought the court would not give him a fair trial. That would be an insult to the courts of India. It seems to me that under the words of s. 10 of the Act of 1881, wide as they may be, we cannot say that it would be unjust or oppressive to return this man to India to take his trial. For these reasons, the court refuses the application.

D

E

F

PARKER, J.: I agree.

Application refused.

Solicitors: Philip Conway, Thomas & Co. (for the applicant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

CORK v. KIRBY MACLEAN, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Donovan, J.), March 17, 18, April 11, 1951. ^{Reversed in part. C.A. [1952] 2 E.R. 402.} Building—Safety regulations—Working platform—“Used for —“Material”—Painter's bucket of distemper and brush—Failure to provide guard-rails or toe-boards—Workman's fall through epileptic fit—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 22 (c), reg. 24 (1).

A
 A painter employed on distemping the roof inside a factory, was working on a platform twenty-seven inches wide and twenty-three feet above the floor and on it from time to time he placed his bucket of distemper and brush. No guard-rails or toe-boards were provided for the platform, contrary to reg. 24 (1) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and, as a result of an epileptic fit, the painter fell from the platform and was killed. He had not disclosed to his employers at the time of his engagement that he was subject to such fits and was forbidden to work at heights. B

C
 HELD: (i) the painter's bucket of distemper and brush were “material” and the platform was used for “the deposit of material” within the meaning of reg. 22 (c) of the regulations, and, therefore, the employers were in breach of the requirement of that regulation that the platform should be not less than thirty-four inches wide,

(ii) as the employers could not discharge the onus which was on them of showing that the painter would have fallen from the platform even if reg. 24 (1) had been complied with, they were liable for damages for the accident as arising from their breach of duty in not complying with it. D

Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. ([1945] 2 All E.R. 547), applied.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd., [1945] 2 All E.R. 547; [1946] K.B. 50; 115 L.J.K.B. 119; 173 L.T. 330; 110 J.P. 76; 2nd Digest Supp.
 (2) Wicks v. Dowell & Co., Ltd., [1905] 2 K.B. 225; sub nom. Wilkes v. Dowell & Co., 74 L.J.K.B. 572; 92 L.T. 677; 34 Digest 266, 2665. E

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

F
 The plaintiff was the administratrix of the estate of her husband, the workman, Albert Cork, who, on Jan. 14, 1950, was employed by the defendants on distemping the roof inside a factory at Colchester belonging to Davey Paxman, Ltd., with whom the defendants had contracted to do the work. While working on a platform twenty-seven inches wide and twenty-three feet above the floor of the factory, to which there were no guard-rails or toe-boards, and on which he used to rest his bucket containing distemper and his brush, the workman fell to the floor and was killed. The plaintiff claimed damages for herself and her infant son under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846-1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, alleging failure by the defendants to provide and maintain a safe system of work and the breach by them of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 22 (c) (requiring in the circumstances a minimum width of platform of thirty-four inches) and reg. 24 (1) (requiring the provision of guard-rails and toe-boards). The defendants contended that the platform was not a platform within the meaning of reg. 22 (c) because it was not used for the deposit of material, and that they were excused from providing toe-boards by the terms of reg. 24 (5) (a) because their provision was impracticable on account of the nature or special circumstances of the work. G
 They submitted that the accident was caused by the onset of an epileptic fit which made the workman lose consciousness and fall, and said that they were absolved from liability because he had concealed from them the fact that he was an epileptic and was forbidden to work at heights. H

F. H. Lawton for the plaintiff.

R. Bowen for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 7. DONOVAN, J., stated the facts and continued: The distemping work in question admittedly comes within the scope of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and the following of those regulations are in point here. By reg. 4:

A "It shall be the duty of every contractor and employer of workmen who is undertaking any of the operations to which these regulations apply (i) to comply with such of the requirements of regs. 5-30 . . . as affect any workman employed by him."

By reg. 22:

B "Every working platform from which a person is liable to fall more than six feet six inches shall be—(a) closely boarded, planked, or plated; (b) at least twenty-five inches wide if the platform is used as a footing only and not for the deposit of any material; (c) at least thirty-four inches wide if the platform is used for the deposit of material."

By reg. 24 (1):

C ". . . every side of a working platform or working place, being a side thereof from which a person is liable to fall a distance of more than six feet six inches, shall be provided with a suitable guard-rail or guard-rails of adequate strength, to a height of at least three feet above the platform or place and above any raised standing place on the platform, and with toe-boards up to a sufficient height being in no case less than eight inches and so placed as to prevent so far as possible the fall of persons, materials and tools from such platform or place."

D The working platform used by the deceased workman to do his work was a platform from which he was liable to fall more than six feet six inches. In fact, he was liable to fall, and did fall, twenty-three feet. The platform was used for the deposit of material—to wit, his bucket containing the distemper he was using and his brush. It was not thirty-four inches wide, but only some twenty-seven inches. Prima facie, therefore, there was a breach by the defendants of reg. 22 (c). Counsel for the defendants contests this view on the ground that, if all that a painter does is to rest his bucket on the platform and lay down his brush there from time to time, the platform is not used "for the deposit of material" within the meaning of the regulation. Some evidence was given to the effect that the painter should carry an "S" hook with him and by means of it hook his bucket on something convenient nearby instead of leaving it on the platform. No such rule was enjoined on the workman. Mr. Everett, the district manager of the defendants, said the bucket could be placed on the platform, and I think the defendants must have contemplated that some of their painters would from time to time do this. It is further clear from the terms of proviso (iv) of reg. 22 (at least to me) that painters' buckets and brushes are "material" within the meaning of the word as used in reg. 22 (c). They are certainly "material" in the ordinary sense of that word in the English language, and I see no reason for giving a restricted meaning to the term in these regulations. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the defendants were in breach of that regulation.

G [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, held that it had not been impracticable to provide toe-boards, and that, therefore, the defendants were in breach of reg. 24 (1) in not providing them, and continued:] The question now arises whether the breaches of the statutory regulations above referred to, or either of them, caused the accident. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (1) makes it clear that the defendants must show that they did not, for here there were breaches of safety regulations and the workman was injured in a way which could result from the breaches. Then, says the Court of Appeal, the onus of proof shifts on to the employer to show that the breach was not the cause. The conclusion from the evidence relating to the epilepsy from which the workman suffered, which seems to me to be inevitable, is that the workman must suddenly have lost consciousness while he was on the platform, and, in consequence, he fell from it to the floor, and I think the reason why he thus lost consciousness must have been the onset of one of the epileptic fits to which he was unfortunately subject. Such a finding, say the defendants, will absolve them from responsibility, for the workman concealed from them that he was an epileptic who had been forbidden to work at heights, and, had he disclosed those facts, as he should, he would never have been put to work on the platform in question. He was shown what work he would have to do before he was engaged and he said he could do it. All this is true. In other words, a causa sine qua non of the accident was the workman's non-disclosure of his affliction. But what I have to determine is, I think, the causa causans of the injuries which the workman suffered, or, as it is described in the case cited to me by counsel for the plaintiff, Wicks v. Dowell & Co., Ltd. (2), the immediate, and not the remote, cause. The immediate cause was the workman's fall from the platform and the effect of what the Court of Appeal said in Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (1) seems to me to be that I must treat the breach of the statutory regulations as occasioning that fall, unless the defendants establish the opposite.

Here, I think, I should be on my guard against a possible insidious effect which the word "epileptic" tends to produce on one's mind. In the last analysis the workman fell from the platform because he lost control over his body. He lost it through unconsciousness induced by epilepsy. The regulations are designed to prevent workmen falling from working platforms, and one obvious reason why a workman may so fall is that temporarily he loses control over his bodily movements. He may lose that control through carelessness, or illness, or unconsciousness. The fact that unconsciousness may be the cause in no way absolves the employer who is in breach of the regulations, still less because the unconsciousness itself is due to some particular malady. The fact that here the cause was epilepsy does not really differentiate the case from that where a man loses consciousness because of an ordinary faint. The defendants say, therefore, as I think they must, that, had the workman told them of his affliction, he would never have been on the platform at all. In my view, they must go further. They must establish that the workman would have fallen off the platform even had handrails and toe-boards been provided. But this is pure speculation. There is an obvious chance that toe-boards might have saved him. It is also possible that he had some sudden, if short, warning of the fit, sufficient to enable him to grip a handrail. On two previous occasions when working for other employers he was able, when having a "bad turn", as he called it, to hold on to the ladder, descend it, and sit or lie down till he was better. It is pure surmise to say that had the regulations been obeyed the workman would still have died.

One cannot help feeling some sympathy with the defendants for they knew nothing of the workman's complaint, but the consequences of disobedience to these statutory regulations cannot depend on whether or not the workman discloses all or some of his infirmities. Otherwise the courts would soon be engaged on compiling a list of legally notifiable disorders. The simpler task is for the employer to do his duty and to obey the regulations, thus protecting himself as well as his workmen. Here the defendants broke the regulations. They told me that they took a deliberate decision not to have handrails or toe-boards, and the reason was that they were commercially impracticable though not impracticable in fact. An accident happened of the kind the regulations were designed to prevent and they must pay for the consequences unless they show that it would have happened had the regulations been obeyed—which they cannot do. In the circumstances the plaintiff succeeds in her claim based on breach of statutory duty.

HIS LORDSHIP assessed the damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846-1908, at £1,500 (including £500 to go to the infant child) and under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, at £294 3s. 6d., and gave judgment for the plaintiff for those amounts.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors: Ellison & Co. (for the plaintiff); Kimber, Williams, Sweetland & Stinson (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re ASTOR'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. ASTOR v. SCHOLFIELD AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), March 21, 24, 25, April 2, 1952.]

Settlement—Application of income of trust funds to be applied during specified period for all or any of certain public, but non-charitable, purposes—Application in discretion of trustees, subject to directions of settlors—Person entitled to fund at end of specified period not at present ascertainable.

By a settlement, dated Feb. 27, 1945, the trustees were directed to pay or apply the income of the trust funds during a specified period "for or towards all or any of the objects or purposes mentioned" in a schedule to the settlement "in such amounts . . . and in such manner . . . as [the settlors] or the survivor of them during their or his lifetime shall from time to time in writing direct . . . or in default of and subject to any such direction then as the trustees in their own discretion shall from time to time decide and so . . . that [the settlors] or the survivor of them may at any time or times by deed release or suspend wholly or partially the foregoing power of direction." "The objects or purposes" mentioned in the schedule included: "1. The establishment maintenance and improvement of good understanding . . . between nations . . . and also between different sections of people in any nation or community. 2. The preservation of the independence and integrity of newspapers and the encouragement of the adoption and maintenance by newspapers of fearless educational and constructive policies. 3. The promotion of the freedom independence and integrity of the Press . . . 5. The protection of newspapers . . . from being absorbed or controlled by combines . . . 6. The restoration . . . protection and maintenance of the independence of . . . writers in newspapers . . . 7. The establishment . . . or support of any charitable public or benevolent schemes . . . for or in connection with (a) the improvement of newspapers or journalism or (b) the relief or benefit of persons . . . engaged in journalism . . ." After the end of the specified period (which did not offend the rule against perpetuities), the trust funds and income thereof were to be held in trust absolutely and beneficially "for the younger of the two persons who shall at such end be respectively the warden of All Souls College Oxford and the master of Trinity College Cambridge . . ." No directions had been given by the settlors in regard to the application of the income of the trust funds. It was agreed that the trusts of the settlement were not charitable.

HELD: (i) as the trusts of income during the specified period were for the benefit of non-charitable purposes and the beneficiary entitled to the trust funds at the end of the specified period was not at present ascertainable, there was no one who could initiate proceedings against the trustees, either directly or indirectly, in respect of the trusts of income during the specified period, and, therefore, the trusts were void as being unenforceable.

Dicta of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in Bowman v. Secular Society, Ltd. ([1917] A.C. 437, 441), applied.

(ii) assuming that an enumeration of purposes which were non-charitable could take the place of an enumeration of beneficiaries, (a) the purposes to which the income of the trust funds was to be applied were not so defined that, if the trustees surrendered their discretion, the court could carry out the purposes declared and not merely a selection of them arrived at by eliminating those which were too uncertain, and (b) the settlement gave no guidance in regard to the manner in which the trusts were to be performed; and, therefore, the trusts of income were void for uncertainty, as they were of such a nature that the court could not control them.

Dictum of LORD ELDON, L.C., in Morice v. Durham (Bishop) (1805) (10 Ves. 539), applied.

AS TO DEFINITION OF OBJECTS TO BE BENEFITED, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 33, pp. 101, 102, paras. 166-170; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 43, pp. 592-595, Nos. 410-437.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Bowman v. Secular Society, Ltd., [1917] A.C. 406; 86 L.J.Ch. 568; 117 L.T. 161; 8 Digest 265, 270.
- (2) A.-G. v. Brown, (1818), 1 Swan. 265 (36 E.R. 384); 1 Wils. Ch. 323 (37 E.R. 138); 8 Digest 257, 184.
- (3) Pettingall v. Pettingall, (1842), 11 L.J.Ch. 176; 8 Digest 264, 258.
- (4) Mitford v. Reynolds, (1848), 16 Sim. 105; 17 L.J.Ch. 238; 10 L.T.O.S. 499; 60 E.R. 812; 8 Digest 320, 1025.
- (5) Re Dean, (1889), 41 Ch.D. 552; 58 L.J.Ch. 693; 60 L.T. 813; 8 Digest 264, 259.
- (6) Pirbright v. Salwey, [1896] W.N. 86; 8 Digest 261, 230.
- (7) Re Hooper, [1932] 1 Ch. 38; 101 L.J.Ch. 61; 146 L.T. 208; Digest Supp.
- (8) Re Thompson, [1934] Ch. 342; 103 L.J.Ch. 162; 150 L.T. 451; Digest Supp.
- (9) Re Price, [1943] 2 All E.R. 505; [1943] Ch. 422; 112 L.J.Ch. 273; 169 L.T. 121; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (10) Re Drummond, [1914] 2 Ch. 90; 83 L.J.Ch. 817; 111 L.T. 156; 8 Digest 244, 28.
- (11) Morice v. Durham (Bp.), (1805), 10 Ves. 522; 32 E.R. 947; affg. (1804) 9 Ves. 399; 32 E.R. 656; 8 Digest 293, 705.
- (12) Re Wood, [1949] 1 All E.R. 1100; [1949] Ch. 498; [1949] L.J.R. 1509; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (13) Re Macduff, [1896] 2 Ch. 451; 65 L.J.Ch. 700; 74 L.T. 706; 8 Digest 296, 731.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the validity of the trusts of income during a specified period declared by a settlement dated Feb. 27, 1945. The trusts of income were for certain public, but non-charitable, purposes, and the person absolutely and beneficially entitled to the trust funds at the end of the period (which did not offend the rule against perpetuities) was not at present ascertainable. By a settlement, dated Aug. 20, 1951, the settlors of the 1945 settlement assigned to trustees any beneficial interest which they might have, by way of resulting trust or otherwise, in the trust funds settled by the 1945 settlement. The trusts of the 1951 settlement were charitable and no question arose in regard to their validity.

E. I. Goulding for the plaintiff, one of the settlors.

Gray, Q.C., and Wilfrid Hunt for the first, second, third and fourth defendants, trustees of the 1945 settlement.

Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and Winterbotham for the fifth and sixth defendants, the trustees of the 1951 settlement.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 2. ROXBURGH, J., read the following judgment. By a settlement, dated Feb. 27, 1945, and made between Viscount Astor, of the first part, his second son, David Astor, of the second part, and Viscount Astor, Arthur Henry Mann, and Thomas Jones, as trustees, of the third part, certain trusts and purposes were declared of substantially all the issued shares of the Observer, Ltd., the proprietors of "The Observer" and other newspapers, which had been transferred to the trustees. The present trustees are Lord Astor and the first four defendants. Clause 5 of the settlement provided that, subject to the provisions of cl. 6 and cl. 8 (which related to accumulations and the remuneration of the trustees), the trustees should during "the specified period", that is,

" . . . the period from the date of the settlement until Jan. 1, 2040, or the earlier expiration of twenty years after the death of the survivor of the issue actually born before the date of the settlement of Lord Astor's late father the Right Honourable William Waldorf first Viscount Astor and his late Majesty King George V. respectively, pay or apply the income of the trust funds for or towards all or any of the objects or purposes mentioned in sched. III hereto at or for such times in such amounts or proportions and in such manner in all respects as Lord Astor and David Astor or the survivor of them during their or his lifetime shall from time to time in writing direct (in respect of the whole or any part or parts of the specified period) or in default of and subject to any such direction then as the trustees in their own discretion shall from time to time decide and so that any income may in accordance with such direction or decision as aforesaid be paid to any person or persons or corporate body for application under this clause without the trustees being bound to see to the actual application thereof and that Lord Astor and David Astor or the survivor of them may at any time or times by deed release or suspend wholly or partially the foregoing power of direction."

Schedule III was headed "Objects or purposes referred to in cl. 5 above (no priority between them is to be inferred from the numbers or order by or in which they are mentioned)" and it provided:

"1. The establishment maintenance and improvement of good understanding sympathy and co-operation between nations, especially the nations of the English speaking world and also between different sections of people in any nation or community. 2. The preservation of the independence and integrity of newspapers and the encouragement of the adoption and maintenance by newspapers of fearless educational and constructive policies. 3. The promotion of the freedom independence and integrity of the Press in all its activities and of the adoption and maintenance of the highest standards throughout the profession of journalism. 4. The control publication carrying on financing or management of any newspapers periodicals books pamphlets or publications or any businesses connected therewith or with the publication thereof. 5. The protection of newspapers (particularly country or provincial newspapers as distinct from those of the capital) from being absorbed or controlled by combines or being tied by finance or otherwise to special or limited views or interests inconsistent with the highest integrity or independence. 6. The restoration encouragement protection and maintenance of the independence of the editors of and writers in newspapers and periodicals and the securing (as far as possible) for the public of full means of ascertaining by whom any newspaper is actually owned or controlled. 7. The establishment assistance or support of any charitable public or benevolent schemes trusts funds associations or bodies for or in connection with the (a) improvement of newspapers or journalism or (b) the relief or benefit of persons (or the families or dependents of persons) actually or formerly engaged in journalism or in the newspaper business or any branch thereof or (c) any of the objects or purposes mentioned in this schedule."

Clause 7 of the settlement provided:

"From and after the end of the specified period the trustees shall hold the trust funds and the income thereof in trust absolutely and beneficially for the younger of the two persons who shall at such end be respectively the warden of All Souls College Oxford and the master of Trinity College Cambridge or if the younger of them shall disclaim this benefit then for the other of them or if either office (of warden or master) shall be vacant at such end then for the person who shall hold the other office at such end."

It is common ground that none of these trusts or purposes offends the rule against perpetuities, that they are not charitable, that no directions have been given by the settlors pursuant to cl. 5, and that the beneficiary to take from and after the end of "the specified period" cannot now be ascertained. But some little time ago Lord Astor and his son were advised that it might be arguable that the trusts of income during "the specified period" were void for uncertainty and it was pointed out to them that the trust at the end of "the specified period" would fail if there was then neither a warden of All Souls College, Oxford, nor a master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Accordingly, on Aug. 20, 1951, Lord Astor and his son, David, assigned to the fifth and sixth defendants, as trustees, any beneficial interest which they might have in the trust funds settled by the 1945 settlement by way of resulting trust or otherwise. The trusts of the 1951 settlement are charitable, and the seventh defendant, the Attorney-General, is interested therein accordingly.

The question on which I am giving this reserved judgment is whether the non-charitable trusts of income during "the specified period" declared by cl. 5 and sched. III of the 1945 settlement are void. Counsel for the trustees of the 1951 settlement and for the Attorney-General have submitted that they are void on two grounds: (i) that they are not trusts for the benefit of individuals; (ii) that they are void for uncertainty. LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON dealt with the first of these two questions in his speech in Bowman v. Secular Society, Ltd. (1), and I will cite two important passages. The first ([1917] A.C. 437) is:

"The question whether a trust be legal or illegal or be in accordance with or contrary to the policy of the law only arises when it has been determined that a trust has been created, and is then only part of the larger question whether the trust is enforceable. For, as will presently appear, trusts may be unenforceable and therefore void, not only because they are illegal or contrary to the policy of the law, but for other reasons."

The second (ibid., 441) is:

"A trust to be valid must be for the benefit of individuals, which this is certainly not, or must be in that class of gifts for the benefit of the public which the courts in this country recognise as charitable in the legal as opposed to the popular sense of that term."

Commenting on those passages, counsel for the trustees of the 1945 settlement observed that Bowman v. Secular Society, Ltd. (1) arose out of a will and he asked me to hold that LORD PARKER intended them to be confined to cases arising under a will. But they were, I think, intended to be quite general in character. Further, counsel pointed out that LORD PARKER made no mention of the exceptions or apparent exceptions which, undoubtedly, exist, and from this he asked me to infer that no such general principle can be laid down. The question is whether those cases are to be regarded as exceptional and anomalous or whether they are destructive of the supposed principle. I must later analyse them. But I will first consider whether LORD PARKER's propositions can be attacked from a base of principle.

The typical case of a trust is one in which the legal owner of property is constrained by a court of equity so to deal with it as to give effect to the equitable rights of another. These equitable rights have been hammered out in the process of litigation in which a claimant on equitable grounds has successfully asserted rights against a legal owner or other person in control of property. Prima facie, therefore, a trustee would not be expected to be subject to an equitable obligation unless there was somebody who could enforce a correlative equitable right, and the nature and extent of that obligation would be worked out in proceedings for enforcement. This is what I understand by LORD PARKER's first proposition. At an early stage, however, the courts were confronted with attempts to create trusts for charitable purposes which there was no equitable owner to enforce. In A.-G. v. Brown (2) LORD ELDON, L.C., explains (1 Swan, 290) how this difficulty was dealt with:

"It is the duty of a court of equity, a main part, originally almost the whole, of its jurisdiction, to administer trusts; to protect not the visible owner, who alone can proceed at law, but the individual equitably, though not legally, entitled. From this principle has arisen the practice of administering the trust of a public charity: persons possessed of funds appropriated to such purposes are within the general rule; but no one being entitled by an immediate and peculiar interest to prefer a complaint, who is to compel the performance of their obligations, and to enforce their responsibility? It is the duty of the King, as parens patriae, to protect property devoted to charitable uses; and that duty is executed by the officer who represents the Crown for all forensic purposes. On this foundation rests the right of the Attorney-General in such cases to obtain by information the interposition of a court of equity . . ."

But if the purposes are not charitable, great difficulties do arise both in theory and in practice. In theory, because, having regard to the historical origins of equity, it is difficult to visualise the growth of equitable obligations which nobody can enforce, and in practice, because it is not possible to contemplate with equanimity the creation of large funds devoted to non-charitable purposes which no court and no department of State can control, or, in the case of maladministration, reform. Therefore, LORD PARKER's second proposition would prima facie appear to be well founded. Moreover, it gains no little support from the practical considerations that no officer has ever been constituted to take, in the case of non-charitable purposes, the position held by the Attorney-General in connection with charitable purposes, and no case has been found in the reports in which the court has ever directly enforced a non-charitable purpose against a trustee. Indeed, where, as in the present case, the only beneficiaries are purposes and an at present unascertainable person, it is difficult to see who could initiate such proceedings. If the purposes are valid trusts, the settlors have retained no beneficial interest and could not initiate them. It was suggested that the trustees might proceed ex parte to enforce the trusts against themselves. I doubt that, but at any rate nobody could enforce the trusts against them. This point is, in my judgment, of importance, because, in most of the cases which are put forward to disprove LORD PARKER's propositions, the court had indirect means of enforcing the execution of the non-charitable purpose.

These cases I must now consider. First, there is a group relating to horses, dogs, graves and monuments, among which I was referred to Pettingall v. Pettingall (3), Mitford v. Reynolds (4), Re Dean (5), Pirbright v. Salwey (6) and Re Hooper (7). In Pettingall v. Pettingall (3) a testator made the following bequest by his will:

"Having a favourite black mare, I hereby bequeath, that at my death, £50 per annum be paid for her keep in some park in England or Wales; her shoes to be taken off, and she never to be ridden or put in harness; and that my executor consider himself in honour bound to fulfil my wish, and see that she be well provided for, and removeable at his will. At her death all payment to cease."

It being admitted that a bequest in favour of an animal was valid, two questions were made: first, as to the form of the decree on this point, and, secondly, as to the disposition of the surplus not required for the mare. KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., said (11 L.J.Ch. 177)

" . . . that so much of the £50 as would be required to keep the mare comfortably, should be applied by the executor, and that he was entitled to the surplus. He must give full information, whenever required, respecting the mare; and if the mare were not properly attended to, any of the parties interested in the residue might apply to the court. The decree on this point ought to be, that £50 a year should be paid to the executor during the life of the mare, or until further order; he undertaking to maintain her comfortably; with liberty for all parties to apply."

Now the points which I wish to make are (i) that it was there admitted that a bequest in favour of an animal was valid, and (ii) that there were persons interested in residue who, having regard to the decree made, would have had no difficulty in getting the terms of the " bequest " enforced. Mitford v. Reynolds (4) related to a sepulchral monument and to horses, and there again there was a remainderman on behalf of charity to see to the enforcement of the directions, and an administration action was on foot.

In Re Dean (5) a testator devised his freehold estates, subject to and charged with an annuity of £750 and to a term of fifty years granted to his trustees, to the use of the plaintiff for life, with remainders over, and he gave to his trustees his horses, ponies and hounds. And he charged his said freehold estates with the payment to his trustees, for the term of fifty years, if any of the said horses and hounds should so long live, of an annual sum of £750. And he declared that his trustees should apply the said annual sum in the maintenance of the horses and hounds for the time being living, and in maintaining the stables, kennels and buildings inhabited by the said animals in such condition of repair as his trustees might deem fit, and, in consideration of the maintenance of his horses, ponies, and hounds being a charge on his said estate as aforesaid, he gave all his personal estate not otherwise disposed of to the plaintiff absolutely. NORTH, J., said (41 Ch.D. 556):

" Then it is said, that there is no cestui que trust who can enforce the trust, and that the court will not recognise a trust unless it is capable of being enforced by someone. I do not assent to that view. There is not the least doubt that a man may if he pleases, give a legacy to trustees, upon trust to apply it in erecting a monument to himself, either in a church or in a churchyard, or even in unconsecrated ground, and I am not aware that such a trust is in any way invalid, although it is difficult to say who would be the cestui que trust of the monument. In the same way I know of nothing to prevent a gift of a sum of money to trustees, upon trust to apply it for the repair of such a monument. In my opinion such a trust would be good, although the testator must be careful to limit the time for which it is to last, because, as it is not a charitable trust, unless it is to come to an end within the limits fixed by the rule against perpetuities, it would be illegal. But a trust to lay out a certain sum in building a monument, and the gift of another sum in trust to apply the same to keeping that monument in repair, say, for ten years, is, in my opinion, a perfectly good trust, although I do not see who could ask the court to enforce it. If persons beneficially interested in the estate could do so, then the present plaintiff can do so; but, if such persons could not enforce the trust, still it cannot be said that the trust must fail because there is no one who can actively enforce it."

This is the best case in the series from the point of view of counsel for the trustees of the 1945 settlement, because NORTH, J., did, undoubtedly, uphold the particular directions, whether or not they could be "actively enforced". But, putting it at its highest, he merely held that there were certainly classes of trusts, of which this was one, in which that objection was not fatal. He did not suggest that it was not generally fatal outside the realm of charity.

In Pirbright v. Salwey (6) a testator, after expressing his wish to be buried in the inclosure in which his child lay in a certain churchyard, bequeathed to the rector and churchwardens of the parish church £800 consols, the interest and dividends to be derived therefrom to be applied, so long as the law for the time being permitted, in keeping up the inclosure and decorating the same with flowers. It was held by STIRLING, J., that the gift was valid for at least a period of twenty-one years from the testator's death, and, semble, that it was not charitable. In Re Hooper (7) a testator bequeathed to his executors and trustees money out of the income of which to provide, so far as they legally could do so, for the care and upkeep of certain graves, a vault and certain monuments. MAUGHAM, J., said ([1932] 1 Ch. 39):

"This point is one to my mind of doubt, and I should have felt some difficulty in deciding it if it were not for Pirbright v. Salwey (6) . . . That was a decision arrived at by STIRLING, J., after argument by very eminent counsel. The case does not appear to have attracted much attention in text-books, but it does not appear to have been commented upon adversely, and I shall follow it."

In Re Hooper (7), and probably also in Pirbright v. Salwey (6), there was a residuary legatee to bring before the court any failure to comply with the directions. But I think that MAUGHAM, J., regarded both these cases as exceptions from the general principle.

Last in this group is Re Thompson (8). I have included this case because, although it relates to the furtherance of fox-hunting and thus moves away from the subject-matter of the group and much nearer the present case, it is expressly founded on Pettingall v. Pettingall (3), and it is, indeed, a most instructive case. The testator bequeathed a legacy of £1,000 to a friend to be applied by him in such manner as he should think fit towards the promotion and furthering of fox-hunting and devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to Trinity Hall in the university of Cambridge. An originating summons was taken out by the executors to determine whether the legacy was valid or failed for want of a definite object or for uncertainty or on other grounds. During the course of the argument, counsel for the friend observed:

"True, there is no cestui que trust who can enforce the application of the legacy, but that is immaterial: Re Dean (5). The object to which the legacy is to be applied is sufficiently defined to be enforced."

But CLAUSON, J., interposed ([1934] Ch. 343):

"The college, as residuary legatees, seem to have an interest in the legacy, as, but for the trust for its application, they would be entitled to it. The procedure adopted by KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., in Pettingall v. Pettingall (3), cited in JARMAN ON WILLS, 7th ed., vol. 2, p. 877, might be followed in this case."

And in his judgment he said (ibid., 344):

"In my judgment the object of the gift has been defined with sufficient clearness and is of a nature to which effect can be given. The proper way for me to deal with the matter will be, not to make, as it is asked by the summons, a general declaration, but, following the example of KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., in Pettingall v. Pettingall (3), to order that, upon the defendant Mr. Lloyd [the friend] giving an undertaking (which I understand he is willing to give) to apply the legacy when received by him towards the object expressed in the testator's will, the plaintiffs do pay to the defendant

Mr. Lloyd the legacy of £1,000; and that, in case the legacy should be applied by him otherwise than towards the promotion and furthering of fox-hunting, the residuary legatees are to be at liberty to apply."

I understand CLAUSON, J., to have held, in effect, that there was somebody who could enforce the purpose indicated because the college, as residuary legatees, would be entitled to the legacy but for the trust for its application, and they could apply to the court to prevent any misapplication or breach of the undertaking given by Mr. Lloyd. I infer from what the learned judge said that he would not have upheld the validity of this non-charitable purpose if there had been no residuary legatee, and no possibility of making such an order as was made in Pettingall v. Pettingall (5).

Lastly, I was referred to Re Price (9), where a testatrix by her will gave one half of her residuary estate to the Anthroposophical Society in Great Britain

" . . . to be used at the discretion of the chairman and executive council of the society for carrying on the teachings of the founder, Dr. Rudolf Steiner."

At first sight this case would appear to be a strong card in the hand of counsel for the trustees of the 1945 settlement. The first part of the judgment proceeds on the footing that the purposes were not charitable. The society was residuary legatee and there was no room for such an order as was made in Re Thompson (8). There was nobody who could have enforced the carrying out of the purposes. On closer inspection, however, it will be found that this point was not raised in argument or referred to in the judgment and the decision was based on Re Drummond (10), which is a different class of case. As the present case cannot, on any view, be assimilated to Re Drummond (10), I need not further consider Re Price (9).

Let me, then, sum up the position so far. On the one side, there are LORD PARKER's two propositions with which I began. These were not new, but merely re-echoed what SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., had said § Ves. 405 in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (11) as long ago as 1804: "There must be somebody, in whose favour the court can decree performance". The position was recently re-stated by HARMAN, J., in Re Wood (12), where he said [1949] 1 All E.R. 1101: "a gift on trust must have a cestui que trust", and this seems to be in accord with principle. On the other side is a group of cases relating to horses and dogs, graves and monuments—matters arising under wills and intimately connected with the deceased—in which the courts have found means of escape from these general propositions, and also Re Thompson (8) and Re Price (9), which I have endeavoured to explain. Re Price (9) belongs to another field. The rest may, I think, properly be regarded as anomalous and exceptional and in no way destructive of the proposition which traces descent from or through SIR WILLIAM GRANT, M.R., through LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON, to HARMAN, J. Perhaps the late SIR ARTHUR UNDERHILL was right in suggesting that they may be concessions to human weakness or sentiment: see UNDERHILL'S LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES, 8th ed., p. 79 (10th ed., p. 97). They cannot, in my judgment, of themselves (and no other justification has been suggested to me) justify the conclusion that a court of equity will recognise as an equitable obligation affecting the income of large funds in the hands of trustees a direction to apply it in furtherance of enumerated non-charitable purposes in a manner which no court or department can control or enforce. I hold that the trusts here in question are void on the first of the grounds submitted by counsel for the trustees of the settlement of 1951 and counsel for the Attorney-General.

The second ground on which the relevant trusts are challenged is uncertainty. If (contrary to my view) an enumeration of purposes outside the realm of charities can take the place of an enumeration of beneficiaries, the purposes must, in my judgment, be stated in phrases which embody definite concepts, and the means by which the trustees are to try to attain them must also be prescribed with a sufficient degree of certainty. The test to be applied is stated by LORD ELDON, L.C., in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (11) as follows (10 Ves. 539):

"As it is a maxim, that the execution of a trust shall be under the control of the court, it must be of such a nature, that it can be under that control; so that the administration of it can be reviewed by the court; or, if the trustee dies, the court itself can execute the trust: a trust therefore, which, in case of maladministration could be reformed; and a due administration directed; and then, unless the subject and the objects can be ascertained, upon principles, familiar in other cases, it must be decided, that the court can neither reform maladministration, nor direct a due administration."

See also Re Macduff (13), per LINDLEY, L.J. ([1896] 2 Ch. 463).

Counsel for the trustees of the 1945 settlement argued that this test was not properly applicable to trusts declared by deed, but I can see no distinction between a will and a deed in this respect. Applying this test, I find many uncertain phrases in the enumeration of purposes in sched. III of the 1945 settlement, e.g., "different sections of people in any nation or community", in para. 1; "constructive policies", in para. 2; "integrity of the Press", in para. 3; "combines", in para. 5; "the restoration . . . of the independence of . . . writers in newspapers", in para. 6; and "benevolent schemes", in para. 7. Counsel for the trustees of the 1945 settlement suggested that, in view of the unlimited discretion bestowed on the trustees (subject only to directions from the settlors), the trustees would be justified in excluding from their purview purposes indicated by the settlors but insufficiently defined by them. But I cannot accept this argument. The purposes must be so defined that, if the trustees surrendered their discretion, the court could carry out the purposes declared, not a selection of them arrived at by eliminating those which are too uncertain to be carried out. If, for example, I were to eliminate all the purposes except those declared in para. 4, and to decree that those declared in para. 4 ought to be performed, should I be executing the trusts of the settlement? But how, in any case, could I decree in what manner the trusts applicable to income were to be performed? The settlement gives no guidance at all. Counsel for the trustees of the 1945 settlement suggested that the trustees might apply to the court ex parte for a scheme. It is not, I think, a mere coincidence that no case has been found outside the realm of charity in which the court has yet devised a scheme of ways and means for attaining enumerated trust purposes. If it were to assume this (as I think) novel jurisdiction over public, but not charitable, trusts, it would, I believe, necessarily require the assistance of a custodian of the public interest analogous to the Attorney-General in charity cases who would not only help to formulate schemes but could be charged with the duty of enforcing them and preventing maladministration. There is no such person. Accordingly, in my judgment, the trusts for the application of income during "the specified period" are void also for uncertainty. But while I have reached my decision on two separate grounds, both, I think, have their origin in a single principle, namely, that a court of equity does not recognise as valid a trust which it cannot both enforce and control. This seems to me to be good equity and good sense.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Janson, Cobb, Pearson & Co. (for all parties other than the Attorney-General); Treasury Solicitor (for the Attorney-General).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

PERRY v. PERRY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), March 3, 4, 19, 20, April 7, 1952.]

Divorce—Desertion—Condonation—Termination of desertion—Sexual intercourse during the statutory period—No intention by deserting wife to return—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 1 (1) (b).

Divorce—Evidence—Undefended suit—Undesirability of leading questions.

The parties were married in 1939, and in May, 1951, the husband presented a petition for divorce alleging that his wife had deserted him from July, 1944, to the date of the petition. In December, 1949, the wife asked the husband for financial assistance. He thereupon visited her and during the period from that date to March, 1950, he went to see her once a fortnight. On each visit he asked her to resume married life with him, but she refused. On either two or three of these occasions he had sexual intercourse with her, as a result of which she gave birth to a child on Dec. 6, 1950, but at no time did the wife resile from her firm and constant intention never to return to her husband.

HELD: (i) the doctrine of condonation or some analogous principle did not apply to the matrimonial offence of desertion as defined in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 1 (1) (b), so as to make sexual intercourse between the spouses within the period of three years immediately preceding the petition an absolute bar to a decree founded on desertion for that period.

Bartram v. Bartram ([1949] 2 All E.R. 270), applied.

Viney v. Viney ([1951] 2 All E.R. 204), not applied.

Reasoning of WILLMER, J., in Whitney v. Whitney ([1951] 1 All E.R. 301), approved.

(ii) though sexual intercourse was beyond doubt a most important incident in the marital relationship, an act, or two or three acts, of intercourse could not be regarded as proof of the resumption of marital relationship where a wife, though participating in such acts, in all other respects repudiated the relationship, and, accordingly, on the facts of the present case the wife had not resumed cohabitation so as to interrupt or terminate the period of desertion.

(iii) mutual intention to resume cohabitation could be proved by evidence, but there was no authority that as regards desertion there existed some strict rule which distinguished the case of a petition by a husband from that of a petition by a wife and compelled the court to conclude against the husband if any act of sexual intercourse had (with knowledge and in the absence of fraud) been proved.

Abercrombie v. Abercrombie ([1943] 2 All E.R. 465), distinguished.

Observations by SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., and JENKINS, L.J., regarding the undesirability of leading questions being put to witnesses in undefended divorce cases.

AS TO CONDONATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 679-682, paras. 1004-1009; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 339, 340, Nos. 3184-3203, and Digest Supps.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Viney v. Viney, [1951] 2 All E.R. 204; [1951] P. 457; 115 J.P. 397.
- (2) Whitney v. Whitney, [1951] 1 All E.R. 301; [1951] P. 250; 115 J.P. 71.
- (3) Bartram v. Bartram, [1949] 2 All E.R. 270; [1950] P. 1; [1949] L.J.R. 1679; 113 J.P. 422; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Pratt v. Pratt, [1939] 3 All E.R. 437; [1939] A.C. 417; 108 L.J.P. 97; 161 L.T. 49; Digest Supp.
- (5) Cramp v. Cramp & Freeman, [1920] P. 158; 89 L.J.P. 119; 123 L.T. 141; 27 Digest 338, 3179.

- (6) Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin, [1944] 1 All E.R. 44; [1944] A.C. 49; 113 L.J.P. 1; 170 L.T. 84; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Blundford v. Blundford, (1883), 8 P.D. 19; 52 L.J.P. 17; 48 L.T. 238; 27 Digest 338, 3175.
- (8) Maslin v. Maslin, [1952] 1 All E.R. 477; 116 J.P. 136.
- (9) Parce v. Paine, [1903] P. 263; 73 L.J.P. 1; 89 L.T. 588; 27 Digest 347, 3285.
- (10) Mummery v. Mummery, [1942] 1 All E.R. 553; [1942] P. 107; 111 L.J.P. 58; 166 L.T. 343; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (11) Weatherley v. Weatherley, [1947] 1 All E.R. 563; [1947] A.C. 628; [1947] L.J.R. 869; 176 L.T. 434; 111 J.P. 220; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (12) Abercrombie v. Abercrombie, [1943] 2 All E.R. 465; 169 L.T. 340; 107 J.P. 200; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (13) Robinson v. Gosnold, (1794), 6 Mod. Rep. 171; 87 E.R. 927.
- (14) Rosell v. Rosell, [1900] 1 Q.B. 9; 69 L.J.Q.B. 55; 81 L.T. 429; subsequent proceedings (1903), 89 L.T. 288; 27 Digest 246, 2172.
- (15) Danforth v. Danforth, (State of Maine) (1895), 33 Atlantic Reps. 781.
- (16) Kennedy v. Kennedy, (State of Illinois) (1877), 87 Illi. Reps. 250.
- (17) Dickerson v. Dickerson, (State of Texas) (1919), 207 South Western Reps. 941.
- (18) Burk v. Burk, (State of West Virginia) (1883) 21 West Virginia Reps. 445.
- (19) Andrews v. Andrews, [1938] Queensland Reports 72.
- (20) Upton v. Upton, [1919] Victoria Reports 612.
- (21) Timms v. Timms, [1925] Victoria Reports 597.
- (22) Struthers v. Struthers, [1943] South Australia Reports 89.
- (23) Fairey v. Fairey, [1947] South Australia Reports 69.
- (24) Roberts v. Roberts & Temple, (1917), 117 L.T. 157; 27 Digest 339, 3182.
- (25) Pulford v. Pulford, [1923] P. 18; 92 L.J.P. 14; 128 L.T. 256; 27 Digest 307, 2846.
- (26) Statham v. Statham, [1929] P. 131; 98 L.J.P. 113; 140 L.T. 292; Digest Supp.
- (27) Beeby v. Beeby, (1799), 1 Hag. Ecc. 789; 162 E.R. 755; 27 Digest 338, 3181.
- (28) Lane v. Lane, [1952] 1 All E.R. 223; [1952] P. 34.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of His Honour JUDGE EMLYN JONES, sitting as commissioner in divorce, dated July 6, 1951, dismissing the petition of the husband for divorce on the ground of the wife's desertion.

Bingham and Sproule Bolton for the husband.

Colin Duncan and Brian T. Neill for the Queen's Proctor.

The wife did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 7. The following judgments were read:

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This appeal is from an order of His Honour JUDGE EMLYN JONES (sitting as commissioner in divorce) dismissing a husband's petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's desertion. The husband and wife were married on July 2, 1939, and there is one child of the marriage born (in circumstances hereafter mentioned) on Dec. 6, 1950. The petition was presented on May 15, 1951, and alleged that the wife had (within the terms of s. 1 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950) deserted the husband without cause for a period of "at least three years", namely, ever since July 6, 1944, "immediately preceding the presentation of the petition". There is no doubt of the facts. The wife did not appear to oppose the petition. Of the husband's evidence the judge said:

"The husband impressed me, and I place this on record, as a truthful and completely honest man, and he told me that even now he was anxious to effect a reconciliation with his wife. It is clear to me that he loved her and still does."

The judge proceeded:

"Upon these facts I am satisfied and so hold that the wife was guilty of desertion on or about July 6, 1944. I am also satisfied that the state of desertion, thus commenced, continued up to the presentation of the petition in the ordinary sense of the word 'desertion'. That is to say, both the fact of separation and the necessary animus on the wife's part so continued. By 'separation' I mean here only that there was no full resumption of cohabitation in a matrimonial home. Of the wife's animus I need only say that I find that at no time since July, 1944, has she formed any intention to resume married life."

So far, the case appears plain and straightforward, but it also appeared that in December, 1949, the husband received a letter from the wife asking him for financial assistance. He thereupon, and during a period which lasted till the end of March, 1950, went to see her once a fortnight. On these occasions the husband, as the commissioner found, asked the wife to return. She refused. It also appeared that on either two or three occasions during this same period the husband had sexual intercourse with his wife, and it was as a result of one or other of these connections that the child of the marriage was born. As appears from the passage which I have read the commissioner found that at the time these acts of intercourse took place the wife did not in any way resile from her firm and constant intention never to return to her husband. Indeed, on Nov. 8, 1950, she wrote to him as follows:

"Bob, it isn't any use asking me to live with you again because I have fully made up my mind I never will. It is nearly six years since you and I parted and I have never felt at any time as if I wanted to return to you. You know we never get on well together. The love was all on your side. I made a big mistake when I married you. I am sorry, but never ask me again. Goodbye."

It will be observed that that letter was written within a month of the birth of the child conceived as a result of the intercourse in the spring, but that the wife did not even inform her husband of her condition. On these facts the commissioner felt himself bound, by the reasoning of the Divisional Court in Viney v. Viney (1), to hold that the acts of intercourse had necessarily put an end to the period of desertion which had begun nearly six years before, and, further, that such earlier desertion could not be revived by the wife's continuing desertion after March, 1950, so as to enable the husband to allege at the date of his petition that the necessary requirements of s. 1 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, had been satisfied. The commissioner was further of opinion that the decision in Viney v. Viney (1) bound him to regard Whitney v. Whitney (2), relied on by the husband, as having been wrongly decided by WILLMER, J.

The question raised is clearly one of difficulty and importance, and counsel for the husband has reviewed the history of the law relating to condonation and to the matrimonial offence of desertion. He has invited us to conclude that, neither on authority nor on principle, is the former applicable to the latter, at least in a case where the alleged condonation has occurred before the presentation of the petition, that is, before the desertion has, by the necessary intendment of the statute, ripened, so to speak, into an offence entitling the deserted spouse to repudiate the marriage and pray for its dissolution. The wife did not appear on the appeal, and we, accordingly, requested the Queen's Proctor to attend before us and assist the court by such arguments as he thought it proper to adduce. We are indebted to counsel for the arguments which he has presented to us for the Queen's Proctor. They were to the effect that the commissioner rightly dismissed the petition.

Counsel for the husband will not, I hope, regard me as unkind if, before I deal with the arguments in the case, I first revert to a matter to which I drew attention during the argument, namely, the form of the questions put to the husband during his examination-in-chief. This examination-in-chief consisted from first to last of a series of questions put (without any comment or objection, be it said, by the judge) in a form so leading as might fairly be said to have deprived the answers, which consisted substantially of the word "Yes", varied occasionally by the phrase: "That is right", of any cogency whatever. I give a few examples which related to matters vital to the husband's case.

"Q.—Was the object of your going to ask her to resume cohabitation ?

A.—Yes. Q.—You asked her on different occasions to come back ? A.—Yes.

Q.—Was she adamant about her refusal ? A.—Yes. Q.—In your mind I think you were wanting to lead up to a reconciliation ? A.—That is right.

Q.—At those meetings when you went to see her you asked her on each occasion whether she would be willing to come back to you ? A.—I did.

Q.—On each occasion did she point blank refuse ? A.—That is right.

Q.—You only had intercourse on two or three occasions, although you saw your wife on a number ? A.—That is right."

I have referred to this matter in the hope that, since this case is likely to be regarded as of some significance, my judgment may prove an effective vehicle to convey to those concerned in the practice and administration of divorce—and I refer not only to counsel, but to judges—and, particularly, in cases where the petitions are undefended, that when all allowance is made for the nervousness of witnesses this form of questioning is not only undesirable but wrong, and is liable to disable any judgment founded on evidence so given. I add, as regards the present case and as regards the view taken by the commissioner of the husband, that at the end of his examination by his counsel the commissioner asked the husband a number of questions himself on the answers to which he obviously in large measure based his findings.

Desertion, which, if it had subsisted for the requisite period, was made a ground for dissolution of marriage by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, was not an offence known to the ecclesiastical or common law founding a decree of separation. Before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the only remedy for desertion was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. By s. 16 of the last-mentioned Act, however, "desertion without cause for two years and upwards" was made a ground whereon either spouse might obtain a decree of judicial separation, and by s. 27 desertion "without reasonable excuse" for a like period became, if coupled with adultery, a ground for dissolution of marriage at the suit of a wife: see RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed., at p. 99. It is not in dispute that the period of desertion now required by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (which is in the same terms as that introduced into the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937) must be a single period continuing up to the date of presentation of the petition, in the latter respect differing from the periods of desertion specified in the Act of 1857. Terms broken by one or more periods of resumed cohabitation which in total amount to three years or more will not suffice. In the present case, therefore, the five and three-quarter years of desertion from July, 1944, before the period of the acts of sexual intercourse are disqualified since they did not end with the presentation of the petition nor can the period from March, 1950, after the acts of intercourse, to May 15, 1951, which admittedly did so end, but is in duration but thirteen or fourteen months, be added to that which preceded the acts of intercourse.

It is, therefore, clear that desertion as a ground for divorce differs from the statutory grounds of adultery and cruelty in one important respect. The offence founding the cause of action is not complete—is (as it were) inchoate—until the action is constituted. If one spouse has committed adultery or has treated the other with cruelty, the latter has an accrued right to petition for divorce.

He or she may at once repudiate the marriage and is no longer bound to affirm it and reinstate the offending spouse. The deserted spouse has no such right, no such election. If the deserting spouse genuinely desires to return, his or her partner cannot refuse reinstatement. It is, moreover (as DENNING, L.J., observed in Bartram v. Bartram (3)), contrary to public policy that the deserted spouse, desiring a resumption of cohabitation and bound to affirm the marriage, should be embarrassed in efforts for reconciliation. It is because of these essential characteristics that, according to counsel for the husband, what is known as "condonation" cannot be properly applicable to the offence of desertion prior to presentation of the petition. Counsel for the Queen's Proctor has not, indeed, contended to the contrary. The burden of his argument is not that an act, or, as in this case, two or three acts, of sexual intercourse should be taken to amount to "condonation" by a husband of a deserting wife (involving directly or by analogy the conditions and consequences attaching to "condonation" as applied to adultery or cruelty), but rather that such an act or acts must involve necessarily such a resumption of cohabitation, of the marital relationship, that the preceding desertion is altogether ended and its consequences wiped away.

Notwithstanding the concession of counsel for the Queen's Proctor as regards "condonation" it will be necessary for me to consider its character and implication hereafter, having regard to the views expressed in Viney v. Viney (1). It is convenient, first, to observe that it is clear—and also agreed between counsel—that "desertion" postulates both (i) the factum of separation and (ii) a continuing animus deserendi on the part of the deserting spouse. In light of the observations of the House of Lords, and particularly LORD MACMILLAN, in Pratt v. Pratt (4) ([1939] 3 All E.R. 438) it may also be relevant to consider the state of mind of the deserted spouse, the husband. In the circumstances of the present case, as found by the judge, nothing is added to the case by any such consideration. It follows, however, as counsel for the Queen's Proctor emphasised, that the absence at any time of either the fact of separation or the intent to desert necessarily puts an end to the desertion; and, though the judge in this case found the wife's animus deserendi to have continued without break up to May 15, 1951, it is the case for the Queen's Proctor that the acts of intercourse that occurred are inconsistent with separation in fact or in law at the time they occurred.

The conception of condonation as understood in England is older than that of divorce according to statute, to which it is now related. Historically it could not have been applied to continuing desertion as a ground for divorce, but that is no necessary reason why it should not be applied now. It is unnecessary for me to refer to any of the older material to which counsel for the husband drew attention, for the implications of condonation have recently been authoritatively stated, for example, by McCARDIE, J., in Cramp v. Cramp & Freeman (5) ([1920] P. 158) and, more particularly, by VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6) ([1944] 1 All E.R. 45). It involves, in the language of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., forgiveness confirmed or made effective by reinstatement. By the law of England it is no less clearly established that the so-called "forgiveness" is conditional—conditional on the "condoned" spouse thereafter fulfilling in all respects the obligations of marriage—so that, if any matrimonial offence is afterwards committed by him or her—whether or not the same as that "condoned" and whether or not in itself giving ground for divorce—the "condonation" ceases to have effect. The offence "condoned" and all its consequences are for all purposes "revived". It was this characteristic which caused McCARDIE, J., in Cramp v. Cramp (5) to observe that the word "forgiveness" (at least as it is understood in the Christian religion) was misleading as an interpretation of "condonation", and that the real import of the latter was "a conditional waiver of the right of the injured spouse to take matrimonial proceedings". So, in the present case counsel for the Queen's Proctor was content to submit that by "condonation" was implied a "conditional sacrifice of an accrued right".

At any rate, the notion of "forgiveness made effective by reinstatement" implies, in my judgment, a right of election on the part of the injured spouse and does not fit the case of a deserted spouse who must always, until presentation of the petition at least, affirm the marriage and be ready to take back the deserting spouse. It is, moreover, naturally applicable to an act committed or a course of conduct rather than to a state of mind, which is the second characteristic of desertion. Finally, the conditional quality of "condonation" and the liability of the condoned offence to be "revived" by subsequent misconduct cannot be made to fit with continuing, but (as regards remedy) incomplete, desertion, for it seems to be established that a period of desertion once terminated cannot afterwards be relied on, when added to a later period of desertion or otherwise, to satisfy the requirements of s. 1 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. In this connection it is to be noted that under the Act of 1857 where a husband had committed adultery and had also committed the offence of desertion without reasonable cause for two years, but the wife had condoned the adultery, subsequent matrimonial misconduct by the husband was held to revive not only the adultery but the desertion: Blandford v. Blandford (7).

Whatever, therefore, may be the situation where acts which in the case, for example, of adultery would have constituted condonation have taken place after presentation of a petition for divorce on the ground of desertion (as occurred in Maslin v. Maslin (8), on which I express no opinion) the conception of condonation has, in my judgment, no application, either in strictness or by analogy (save, perhaps, indirectly to the extent later mentioned in regard to resumed cohabitation), to a current period of desertion. I do not forget that desertion, though of a character not sufficient to give grounds for divorce, is, nevertheless, a matrimonial offence. Even if such an offence could be said to be "condoned" by some act or conduct not involving a resumption of the marital relationship, such a condonation would be in principle "conditional" so that the offence would be for all purposes revived by subsequent misconduct: see Blandford v. Blandford (7), and see, as regards the old so-called "statutory desertion", Paine v. Paine (9).

It follows from what I have said that I have formed a view different from that which I understand to have been entertained by LORD MERRIMAN, P., and HAVERS, J., in Viney v. Viney (1). For, although in reference to his own previous decision in Mummery v. Mummery (10) the President said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 206):

"The question was whether the desertion theretofore established was interrupted, or, alternatively, condoned . . ."

he seemed to treat, as also did HAVERS, J., the matter afterwards as turning solely on condonation or to have regarded the two alternatives as being in truth the same. He continued (ibid.):

"The two things which it is, in my opinion, vital to remember in Mummery v. Mummery (10) . . . are these (i) that it was the wife who was the petitioner, not the husband, and (ii) that there was no bilateral intention to resume cohabitation."

He then refers to Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6), observing that that case (ibid., 207)

" . . . re-emphasised in unmistakable manner the essential difference between the position of a husband and that of a wife in relation to evidence of sexual intercourse as proof of condonation."

On such a matter I express with the utmost diffidence a view different from that of LORD MERRIMAN, P., but, in my judgment, with the question, aye or no, has there been condonation on the part of the injured spouse "bilateral" (by which I understand is meant "common" or "mutual") intention has nothing to do.

As the House of Lords decided in Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6) sexual intercourse is conclusive proof of condonation of adultery by a husband who has knowledge of the adultery and in the absence of fraud by the wife, whatever may have been in fact the intention of either spouse. That it may not be so in the case of an injured wife depends on the proposition that the situations of a husband and wife are not entirely the same. Historically they plainly were not, and modern legislation may be said not effectively to have been capable of eliminating all biological differences. Still, the difference in situation is not obvious in a case where the wife has voluntarily left her husband and has for years been living entirely separate from and independent of him.

I add that my conclusion is, as I think, reinforced by the circumstance that by s. 4 (2) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, condonation of adultery or cruelty is expressly made a bar to a decree, but there is no reference to condonation in relation to desertion, as there is not, though the reason may be different, in relation to continuing unsoundness of mind made a ground of divorce by s. 1 (1) (d). It is true that there is no reference to condonation as regards a petition by the wife on the ground that her husband has been guilty of rape, sodomy or bestiality, but in those cases condonation may clearly be made applicable by analogy, and in any case condonation was regarded by the ecclesiastical courts prior to 1857 as a bar to divorce a mensa et thoro on the ground of bestiality no less than on the grounds of adultery or cruelty.

There remains, however, the question—the main argument of counsel for the Queen's Proctor—whether an act of sexual intercourse, or at least two or three acts such as were proved in the present case, should be treated against a husband petitioner as constituting such a resumption of the marital relationship as puts a stop, for good and all, to the precedent period of desertion by the wife. There is no doubt that resumption of marital relationship or resumption of cohabitation (for the purpose I treat the two formulae as synonymous) puts an end to desertion. The proposition has been clearly recognised by Parliament: see, for example, the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 7, the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, s. 2 (2), and the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 6 (3), re-enacted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 7 (3). Approaching the matter as res integra and without regard to authority, I should have thought that the question whether cohabitation or marital relationship has or has not been resumed is a question of fact and degree to be determined according to common-sense principles.

Sexual intercourse is beyond doubt a most important incident in the relationship, though its significance will obviously vary, for example, according to the age of the spouses. Still, I should not have thought (again treating the matter without reference to authority) that an act, or two or three acts, of intercourse without more could sensibly be regarded as necessarily determining the question, and I should also have thought that mutual or "bilateral" intention was in this matter essential. Without attempting a definition, the implication of desertion is a rejection of all the obligations of marriage. It has been held by the House of Lords in Weatherley v. Weatherley (11) that absolute refusal of sexual relations by one spouse, who in other respects fulfils the duties of marriage, could not amount to desertion, and, if this is so, it does not seem to me shocking or unreasonable that participation in one or two acts of intercourse by a husband or wife, who in all other respects repudiated the marital relationship, should not be regarded as necessarily constituting a resumption of such relationship. If this view be right, then on the facts found in the present case I should conclude that there had been no such resumption.

In my judgment, the prima facie view which I have expressed is supported by the authorities. More particularly I think that, on authority, mutual intention is of the essence of the matter. LORD MERRIMAN, P., so stated in Mummery v. Mummery (10), and his view was expressly confirmed by the Court of Appeal in Bartram v. Bartram (3). In that case BUCKNILL, L.J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 272):

"In the present case, the husband has established actual desertion by the wife for many months. That being so, it seems to me that the husband is entitled to say that the desertion once established continues until it is proved that it has been brought to an end. The wife does not suggest for one moment that she brought it to an end. The question is: Do the facts proved establish that it was brought to an end? In my view, it can only be brought to an end if the facts show an intention on the part of the wife to set up a matrimonial home with the husband. If the facts do not establish any intention on the part of the wife to set up a matrimonial home, the mere fact that, as a lodger, she went to live under the same roof as her husband, because she had nowhere else to go, does not remove the desertion which she had already started and which continued to run."

According to ASQUITH, L.J. (ibid., 273):

"Having regard to those and other proved circumstances in the case, it seems to me wrong to hold that the three years period was interrupted by any resumption of cohabitation, for such resumption involves, in the language of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Mummery v. Mummery (10), a bilateral intention on the part of both spouses to set up a matrimonial home together. In my view, the facts proved in this case negative any such intention on the part of the wife who was not a free agent but was acting under the spur of . . . necessity . . ."

I have already referred to the judgment to the like effect of DENNING, L.J. Bartram v. Bartram (3) is binding on this court and on principle, in my view, concludes the present case in the husband's favour.

We were referred to a number of other cases, but none of them, in my judgment, so qualifies the effect of Bartram v. Bartram (3) as to compel me to hold that the acts of intercourse proved in the present case must be treated, as against the husband, as conclusive of the resumption of the marital relationship. That such acts will be evidence of such a resumption I do not doubt, and it may even be (on an analogy to this limited extent from condonation) that they will weigh somewhat more heavily against a husband than a wife. Mutual intention must, in my view, on proper evidence be proved, and I find no authority, pace the Divisional Court in Viney v. Viney (1), that there is as regards desertion some strict rule which distinguishes the case of a petition by a husband from that of a petition by a wife and compels the court to conclude against the former if any act of sexual intercourse has (with knowledge and in the absence of fraud) been proved. The decision in Abercrombie v. Abercrombie (12) by no means turned on the fact that there had been acts of sexual intercourse, but rather on the fact that to such extent as the limitations of the circumstances imposed on them the two spouses had in truth resumed matrimonial relationship. In Robinson v. Gosnold (13) HOLT, C.J., expressed the opinion that an act of intercourse with a wife who had deserted re-imposed on a husband liability for her debts. The opinion was obiter and given long before desertion for a period continuing to the date of presentation of the petition was made a ground of divorce. In Rowell v. Rowell (14) the question was of a somewhat different character, whether the essential condition of a deed of separation had been determined by what LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J. (presiding in this court), called "casual and intermittent connection". The court answered the question negatively and the reasoning at least lends, in my judgment, and has been regarded as lending, support to the view at which I have arrived. Though I have ventured to differ from certain of the views expressed by the Divisional Court in Viney v. Viney (1) (which was an adultery case), I must not be taken to be suggesting that on its facts that case was wrongly decided, nor to be deciding that also on its facts

WILLMER, J., rightly decided Whitney v. Whitney (2), but I am unable to agree with the Divisional Court that in the last named case WILLMER, J., misdirected himself on the law.

There remains the point that—particularly having regard to the birth of the child in December, 1950—it is contrary to common sense to suppose that at the time of the proved acts of intercourse and of the conception of the child its parents were separated in fact and truth. I am unable to agree. If the right view is that there must be some reality of resumed cohabitation to stop the running of desertion, common sense is by no means offended by my conclusion. The question is of the inference to be drawn from acts of intercourse. To that question the birth of the child appears to me to be an irrelevant misfortune. The quality of the acts of intercourse cannot be affected by the accident of their result. Nor can I think that it would as a matter of public policy be desirable that matters of this kind should involve possible questions of dispute about the use of contraceptives.

The industry of counsel enables them to put before us references to the relevant law in the United States of America and Australia, and out of respect to that industry I should like to conclude this judgment by some references to that law. In America the matter seems to be regarded as doubtful. In the CORPUS JURIS SECUNDUM, vol. 27, s. 59, it is stated:

“Offenses which may be condoned. It has been held that the doctrine of condonation applies to all charges of matrimonial misconduct, although it has also been held that the doctrine is inapplicable to causes of a continuing character. Condonation has been held to apply to adultery and to desertion.”

See also BISHOP (1891 ed., s. 1773). Of the cases cited Danforth v. Danforth (15), Kennedy v. Kennedy (16), and, perhaps, Dickerson v. Dickerson (17) support the view I have expressed. On the other side is Burk v. Burk (18) decided in West Virginia in 1883, but it may be said that the judges in the last case were expressing the strong view then held in that State as regards all divorce. The president of the court began his judgment (21 West Virginia Reps. 449):

“This will be the first reported divorce case in this State. We would gladly wish that it might be the last.”

The material part of his judgment is as follows (ibid., 453):

“To constitute ‘desertion’ within the meaning of the statute, there must be a combination of two things: an intention to desert, and an actual breaking off of the matrimonial cohabitation. The matrimonial cohabitation cannot be broken off by the mere fact of living in separate houses, while the husband constantly or at any time occupies the marriage-bed. If such a thing could be for a moment tolerated, then a man would have a legal warrant for the space of three years to make his wife his mere mistress, an act as shocking to the law as it is to morality and religion.”

Of the Australian cases cited, in Andrews v. Andrews (19), decided by the full Court of Queensland, and in Upton v. Upton (20) and Timms v. Timms (21), both before the full Court of Victoria, the husband was in each case the deserter. The decisions were uniformly to the effect that the desertion was not stopped or condoned by “casual” acts of intercourse on the ground that the matrimonial relationship had not thereby been re-established. In the South Australian case of Struthers v. Struthers (22) the question did not directly arise since there had been clearly a resumption of full cohabitation. But SIR MELLIS NAPIER, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the full court, referred to the other Australian cases apparently without disapproval and without distinguishing between the cases of a deserting husband and a deserting wife. He said ([1943] South Australia Reps. 92):

“We have referred to the cases which show that desertion is not terminated or interrupted by casual acts of intercourse or casual visits, without any return to the routine of common life, or anything resembling 'the re-establishment of the matrimonial relationship' (Timms v. Timms (21)). There may be condonation which is not followed by cohabitation, and it would be contrary to public policy to treat a casual return, for the purpose of exploring the possibilities of reconciliation, as a resumption of cohabitation."

- A —language anticipating that used seven years later by DENNING, L.J., in Bartram v. Bartram (3). On the other hand, in the later South Australian case of Fairey v. Fairey (23), REID, J., held that in the case of a deserting wife a single act of intercourse amounted to condonation on the husband's part. He relied, however, on the fact that by the express terms of s. 11 of the South Australian Matrimonial Causes Act condonation is applicable, indifferently, to all grounds of divorce, thereby distinguishing his case from the cases decided in Victoria where by the local Marriage Acts condonation is not expressly made a ground for refusing a decree in a suit for divorce based only on desertion. Fairey v. Fairey (23) is thus no less inapplicable to a case decided under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, of this country. It appears, therefore, that the weight of the American and Australian authority cited to us is consonant with the view which is, in my judgment, correct in principle and which in any case Bartram v. Bartram (3) binds us to adopt. For the reasons which I have stated I think that the appeal should be allowed and that the husband is entitled to his decree.

- JENKINS, L.J.: This being an undefended case the evidence comprises only the barest outline of the facts elicited, as is, unfortunately, too often the case in undefended causes, from the petitioner husband largely by leading questions. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts.] The learned commissioner formed a most favourable view of the husband as a truthful and completely honest man, and his conclusion on the facts was that the wife was entirely to blame, and was guilty on July 6, 1944, of desertion which

- E "continued up to the presentation of the petition in the ordinary sense of the word desertion. That is to say both the fact of separation and the necessary animus on the wife's part so continued."

He added:

- F "By 'separation' I mean here only that there was no full resumption of cohabitation in the matrimonial home. Of the wife's animus I need only say that I find that at no time since July, 1944, has she formed any intention to resume married life."

- G After considering the authorities bearing on the question whether sexual intercourse between spouses during the period of three years immediately preceding the presentation by one of them of a petition for divorce based on desertion under s. 1 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, precludes the granting of a decree on that ground, the learned commissioner regarded himself as bound, by what was said in the House of Lords in Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6) as to the irrevocable effect of condonation by intercourse on the husband's part, and having regard also to the reasoning of the Divisional Court in Viney v. Viney (1) and the disapproval therein expressed of Whitney v. Whitney (2), where a husband was granted a decree notwithstanding intercourse with the deserting wife within the three years period, to dismiss the petition, which he accordingly did.

- H From that decision the husband now appeals, and the questions to be considered are substantially: (i) whether the mere fact of sexual intercourse between a deserted and a deserting spouse, without anything more towards the resumption of cohabitation in the full sense, is consistent with the continuance of the state of desertion, and, therefore, does not preclude the granting to the deserted party of a decree based on three years' desertion on a petition presented within three years after such intercourse (a) if the deserted party is the husband, and (b)

if the deserted party is the wife; and (ii) whether the doctrine of condonation or some analogous principle applies to the matrimonial offence of desertion as defined in s. 1 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, so as to make sexual intercourse between spouses within the three years period an absolute bar to a decree founded on desertion for that period, at all events where the deserted party is the husband.

A
Apart from authority, I, speaking for myself, would have been disposed to regard sexual intercourse between a deserted and a deserting spouse as in itself essentially inconsistent with the continuance of the state of desertion between them, and thus interrupting the statutory period of desertion whether the deserted party was the husband or the wife. There is, to my mind, an element of repugnancy in the conception of a husband and wife, while in the act of having sexual intercourse with each other as husband and wife, being, nevertheless, in a state of desertion. It is well settled that cohabitation without actual sexual intercourse may condone adultery, whereas sexual intercourse with knowledge of the facts does in itself inevitably condone it, at all events where the husband is the injured party, even if there is nothing more in the way of resumption of cohabitation in the full sense. It seems to me, prima facie, unreasonable that an act which is accorded such a decisive effect as an affirmation by the injured party of the married state for the purposes of condonation should be able to take place consistently with the uninterrupted continuance of a state of desertion, which while it continues amounts to a negation of the married state. Suppose the case of a wife who is in desertion and has committed adultery. With knowledge of the adultery the husband seeks her out and has intercourse with her. This is decisive as a condonation of, and affirmation of, the marriage, notwithstanding the adultery. The husband, by his conduct, has taken his wife back as his wife, adulteress though she has been. How can it consistently be said that, although he has taken her back and reinstated her as his wife, she has not come back to him, but has been continuously, even during the decisive act of intercourse, in a state of desertion from him?

D
This illustration, at all events where the husband is the deserted party, reinforces the conclusion to which, apart from authority, I would, speaking for myself, be disposed to come—that sexual intercourse between a deserted and a deserting spouse, even when unaccompanied by resumption of cohabitation in other respects, puts an end to or interrupts the period of desertion. In other words, I would, speaking for myself, be inclined, apart from authority, to hold that while desertion is terminated by resumption of cohabitation in the full sense it does not follow that desertion can only be terminated by such resumption, and that sexual intercourse in itself, irrespective of any resumption of cohabitation in other respects, does suffice to terminate it, as being essentially inconsistent with the continuance of a state of desertion. I would add that my inclination so to hold would be stronger in the case of a deserted husband than in the case of a deserted wife by reason of the more cogent application to the case of a deserted husband of the comparison I have sought to draw with the effect of sexual intercourse for the purposes of condonation.

E
F
G
H
The question is, however, by no means free from authority, and we have been referred to a large number of cases, including several from the United States of America and Australia, bearing directly or indirectly on it. I do not propose to embark on any protracted review of all these decisions, as reference to only a few of them will suffice to indicate the course which, in my judgment, this court is bound by authority to take. I will begin with Rowell v. Rowell (14) where it was held by this court that the fact that intercourse had taken place between spouses living apart under a deed of separation was not of itself conclusive evidence that the separation had come to an end so as to make the deed of no effect, or in particular so as to put an end to the husband's obligation under the deed to pay a weekly sum to the wife during their joint lives if they should so long live separate from one another. Although that case was concerned with a contractual separation under a deed, and not with desertion, and the question, therefore, was whether, by reason of the mere fact of sexual intercourse, unaccompanied by any resumption of cohabitation in other respects, the parties had ceased to "live separate and apart from each other" within the meaning of the deed, there is no doubt that it has been regarded as authority for the proposition that sexual intercourse between a deserted and a deserting spouse does not of itself put an end to desertion.

In Mummery v. Mummery (10) LORD MERRIMAN, P., founding himself to a great extent on Rowell v. Rowell (14), held that a single act of intercourse between a deserted wife and a deserting husband consented to by the wife in the hope of effecting a reconciliation with the husband, who for his part never intended to live with her again, and, in fact, left her the next morning and never returned, did not operate as a condonation of the desertion prior to the act of intercourse or break the continuous desertion for upwards of three years immediately preceding the presentation of the wife's petition. LORD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 555):

"... a resumption of cohabitation in the full sense of the word puts an end to a state of desertion, and that not merely because it condones the previous desertion for whatever time that offence has lasted, but also because a resumption of cohabitation is the exact negation of a state of desertion. The two things cannot exist together. In this case, of course, it is completely clear that, apart from whatever may be the legal effect of what happened on that particular night, the husband had not the slightest intention of resuming cohabitation in the ordinary sense of the word. On any view of the matter, even assuming that I am bound to hold that cohabitation was resumed or that the offence had been condoned on that occasion, it is plain that the husband resumed a state of desertion again the next day. I think . . . that the question for decision is whether or not the fact that they spent the night together, and for that night resumed marital relations in the usual sense, is conclusive evidence of the fact that there had been a resumption of cohabitation so as to condone the previous desertion and bring the state of desertion to an end. If the fact that sexual intercourse has taken place between the parties is conclusive, there is nothing more to be said about it. The wife does not suggest . . . that her consent to that act was obtained by fraud, so that the issue raised in Roberts v. Roberts & Temple (24) does not arise. It seems to me that the whole question turns on what cohabitation means, and what a resumption of cohabitation means. Now, LORD MERRIVALE said more than once that no judge has ever attempted a comprehensive definition of desertion and that no judge would ever succeed in doing so. Amongst the descriptions of desertion which he gave was one which has always appealed to me. He said that desertion was a withdrawal, not from a place, but from a state of things (Pulford v. Pulford (25) ([1923] P. 21)). Similarly, I doubt whether any judge could give a completely exhaustive definition of cohabitation, and certainly I am not going to attempt to do so. At least a resumption of cohabitation must mean resuming a state of things—that is to say, setting up a matrimonial home together. That involves, so it seems to me, a bilateral intention on the part of both spouses so to do. The question, then, is: Does coming together for a single night raise an irrebuttable presumption that the parties have resumed cohabitation even for that short time? Put in another way, does it raise an irrebuttable presumption that the wife, in consenting to that state of things, has condoned the previous desertion? . . . I think that it would lead to an absurd state of things if one were bound to hold that that is so."

After describing as "praiseworthy" every legitimate attempt by a wife to regain her husband's affection and pointing out that the mere occurrence of meetings arranged with a view to effecting a reconciliation obviously would not compel the court to hold that the state of desertion was brought to an end, LORD MERRIMAN, P., continued (ibid.):

"Why, then, should a wife who goes a step further in the hope of effecting a reconciliation, and allows her husband to sleep the night with her, be held to have condoned the offence and to have resumed cohabitation when it is clear, beyond the slightest shadow of doubt, that the husband at the same time had no intention . . . of resuming cohabitation? I do not think that I am obliged so to hold. I think the law is that, as regards the wife at any rate, an act of sexual intercourse is not conclusive on the question of condonation; and that it does not raise an irrebuttable presumption that cohabitation has been resumed. I think I am justified in holding, if not obliged so to hold, on the authority of Rowell v. Rowell (14)."

The President then proceeded to cite at some length from the judgments in that case and expressed his conclusion thus (ibid., 556):

" . . . I think that I am justified in holding here that there has been neither condonation nor a resumption of cohabitation which interrupts this period of desertion, and that the wife is entitled to her decree."

The judgment in Mummery v. Mummery (10) received the unqualified approval of this court in Bartram v. Bartram (3), and must, therefore, be regarded as an authority binding on us, and it seems to me to establish the proposition that in order to terminate or interrupt the state of desertion between a deserted and a deserting spouse there must be a resumption of cohabitation, that is to say, the setting up of a matrimonial home together pursuant to a "bilateral", which I take to mean a "common" or "mutual", intention to do so. Indeed, in Bartram v. Bartram (3), DENNING, L.J., went further and said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 273):

" . . . I would say in such a case the period of desertion does not cease to run unless, and until, a true reconciliation has been effected . . . Any other view would greatly hamper attempts at reconciliation, because it would mean that the deserted party would be disinclined to take the other back for fear of losing his legal rights in case the reconciliation was unsuccessful."

It seems to me necessarily to follow that mere acts of sexual intercourse between a deserted and a deserting spouse, not accompanied by any setting up of a matrimonial home together or by any intention on the part of the deserting spouse to do so, do not terminate or interrupt the state of desertion.

In Mummery v. Mummery (10) LORD MERRIMAN, P., was careful to preserve the possible distinction between the case of a deserted wife (which was then before him) and the case of a deserted husband, having in mind, no doubt, the question of condonation (to which I will return) and the much greater weight attributable to sexual intercourse as condonation by a husband than as condonation by a wife. For my part, if I have rightly stated the ratio decidendi in Mummery v. Mummery (10) as expressly approved in Bartram v. Bartram (3), it seems to me, setting aside for the moment the question of condonation, to leave no room for any such distinction. If what is indispensably necessary to end or interrupt desertion is the resumption of cohabitation in the sense of the setting up of a matrimonial home together accompanied by a common intention on the part of both spouses to do so, then mere sexual intercourse between a deserted and a deserting spouse unaccompanied by any such setting up, or common intention to do so, cannot end or interrupt the state of desertion, whether the deserter is the husband or the wife, and whether or not the intercourse leads (as in the present case) to the birth of a child.

In Whitney v. Whitney (2) WILLMER, J., following Bartram v. Bartram (3) and Mummery v. Mummery (10), held a husband entitled to a decree on the ground of desertion by his wife for the statutory period of three years notwithstanding sexual intercourse with his wife on some half dozen occasions during that period, the intercourse having taken place on week-end visits made by the husband to the wife in attempts to effect a reconciliation, and the wife on her part never having had any intention of setting up a matrimonial home, but having on the contrary since her initial act of desertion maintained her deter-

A mination to live separate and apart from her husband. Subject to what I will say below on the question of condonation, I think that on the authorities WILLMER, J., was right in so holding. In Viney v. Viney (1), however, a Divisional Court, consisting of LORD MERRIMAN, P., and HAVERS, J., disapproved Whitney v. Whitney (2) on the ground that the husband in that case must be taken to have condoned the desertion, and referred at some length to the re-statement of the doctrine of condonation and the conclusive effect for that purpose of sexual intercourse on the part of an injured husband contained in the speech of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6). Both Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6) and Viney v. Viney (1) were cases of adultery, the application to which of the doctrine of condonation in the strict sense is undoubted. The same can, in my view, however, by no means be said in relation to desertion of the kind here in question, that is, the continuing and, so to speak, ambulatory offence of desertion for a period of at least three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, which can never become complete until the petition is actually presented, as distinct from, for example, the desertion by a husband for a period of two years (completed at any time) which under s. 27 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, in conjunction with the husband's adultery entitled the wife to a divorce, and which, as appears from Blandford v. Blandford (7), could be the subject of condonation and revival. Clearly, unless the doctrine of condonation or some analogous principle is applicable to the new statutory offence of desertion for the period of three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, the strictures passed in Viney v. Viney (1) on the decision in Whitney v. Whitney (2) are not well founded.

E This brings me to the consideration of the second of the two questions stated earlier in this judgment, that is, whether the doctrine of condonation or some analogous principle does apply to desertion as defined in s. 1 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. Counsel for the Queen's Proctor, who on the first question supported in argument substantially the view above expressed as the view I would myself, apart from authority, have been disposed to prefer, did not contend as regards the second question that the doctrine of condonation in the strict sense applies to desertion as defined in s. 1 (1) (b), and, in my view, the difficulties in the way of so applying it are really insuperable.

I will not attempt to add any definition of my own to the various statements of the doctrine of condonation to be found in the authorities; but I think it may, at all events, be said that condonation properly so called does, at all events, involve (i) an election by the injured spouse to affirm the marriage notwithstanding the condoned offence, and (ii) the possibility of revival of the condoned offence by any further matrimonial offence on the part of the guilty spouse. Now, it is the essence of the offence of desertion that the deserted spouse should all the time be affirming the marriage; otherwise desertion ceases and becomes (in effect) separation by consent. There is thus no question of election on the part of the deserted spouse to affirm or disaffirm it. He or she has no option but to affirm. Further, the offence of desertion for a period of three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, once condoned, could never be revived, because the continuous period of desertion required by the statute would be irretrievably broken. For these reasons it seems to me that the doctrine of condonation in its strict sense is inappropriate and inapplicable to the offence of desertion as defined in s. 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1950.

Counsel for the Queen's Proctor did, however, submit, and I was attracted by the submission, that by analogy to the doctrine of condonation in the strict sense a deserted spouse, or at all events a deserted husband, who chooses to have sexual intercourse with the deserter must be treated as having conclusively affirmed the marriage and waived or remitted the deserting spouse's desertion for any period preceding the act of intercourse. In the end I find myself forced to the conclusion that this view cannot stand consistently with the ratio decidendi in Mummery v. Mummery (10) as approved in Bartram v. Bartram (3). If sexual intercourse without resumption of cohabitation in other respects does not put an end to or interrupt the state of desertion, then the state of desertion and the offence of the deserting party continues notwithstanding the intercourse, and there is no room for the application of the doctrine of condonation or any analogous principle. To apply it would be as much as to say either that the state of desertion can be brought to an end and can be interrupted by sexual intercourse alone without any setting up by the spouses of a matrimonial home together and without any mutual or common or bilateral intention to do so (which the ratio decidendi in Mummery v. Mummery (10), as approved in Bartram v. Bartram (3), in my view, forbids), or else that the offence of desertion can be condoned, although it continues without a break before during and after the act relied on as constituting condonation, which seems to me impossible. Accordingly, in deference to the authorities rather than by my own inclination, I would allow this appeal.

HODSON, L.J.: The question of law which falls to be determined is whether a husband who has been deserted by his wife can succeed in a petition for divorce if during the three years before the petition he has had sexual connection with her. This question was answered in the negative by the learned commissioner, who, in doing so, followed the dicta of LORD MERRIMAN, P., and HAVERS, J., in Viney v. Viney (1) which disapproved a decision of WILLMER, J., in Whitney v. Whitney (2), where the same question was answered in the affirmative. The reasoning on which LORD MERRIMAN, P., founded himself is plain and logical. Desertion is a matrimonial offence. A husband who has sexual relations with his erring spouse with knowledge thereof cannot be heard to say that he has not condoned the offence: Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6). Therefore, desertion prior to sexual relations is manifestly condoned by a husband. This is so although in the case of a wife who has been deserted and submits to the embraces of her husband in an endeavour to secure his return, condonation will not inevitably be found against her if she seeks to rely on a period of desertion before as well as after such an event: see Mummery v. Mummery (10). This conclusion is permissible since the doctrine of condonation where a wife submits to her husband, he being the wrongdoer, operates in a different way from that in which it operates where the position is reversed and the wife is the wrongdoer: Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6).

Counsel for the Queen's Proctor has contended for a negative answer to the question, but he has not put the case in the same way. He admits that the doctrine of condonation does not apply except by analogy to what may be called a current period of desertion as opposed to a period which of itself provides a complete cause of action. He contends that the act of voluntary sexual intercourse is, however, conclusive evidence of a termination of desertion, and that neither party can be heard to say after such an act that cohabitation has not been resumed. Accordingly, he says Mummery v. Mummery (10) was wrongly decided because once the sexual act is proved the factum of separation has gone. He contends that the act cannot be referable to anything else but living together as husband and wife. In my judgment, the argument, although it has considerable force, is not consistent with authority. It is now, I think, too late to say that acts of intercourse per se operate to terminate desertion.

Assistance is, I think, derived from Rowell v. Rowell (14), a decision of this court upon the construction of a deed of separation expressed to operate during the joint lives of the parties "if they should so long live separate from each other". The question there was whether the deed ceased to operate because the sexual act had taken place; in other words, must the parties be held to have ceased to live separate from each other because this event had occurred? The question was answered in the negative. In my opinion, this involves a conclusion that the parties had not ceased to live apart, which is the same thing as had not "resumed cohabitation", to use the formal language employed by the legislature in the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. I conceive that the result of this case would have been the same whichever spouse was setting up the deed. This case was followed by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Mummery v. Mummery (10), which was a desertion case. The last decision has been regularly followed and expressly affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Bartram v. Bartram (3). In the latter case the particular point was not in question, but the significance of the acts of intercourse can hardly have been overlooked by the members of the court. In any event I would respectfully accept the decision of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Mummery v. Mummery (10) and the reasoning on which it is based with one qualification. In Mummery v. Mummery (10) the President expressly reserved the point now in question by using the words "as regards the wife at any rate", thus showing plainly that he had in mind the impact of the doctrine of condonation on sexual intercourse by a husband with an erring wife.

This brings me to consider the question whether the court is bound to hold that the husband is precluded by his act of having had sexual relations with his wife from relying on desertion preceding that act because he has thereby condoned her desertion. In the first place there is no authority binding on this court to this effect. The actual decision of the Divisional Court in Viney v. Viney (1) is not open to criticism since the offence there under consideration was adultery, so that condonation of adultery only was directly in question. The observations on the question now before the court were obiter dicta. Cases under the old law such as Blandford v. Blandford (7), and Paine v. Paine (9), where condonation was applied to completed desertion giving rise in each case to a cause of action, are not directly in point. The same may be said of Maslin v. Maslin (8), a recent decision of HAVERS, J., where, intercourse having taken place after a petition based on desertion had been presented by the husband, the petition was dismissed. The absence of any reference to condonation in the section of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, dealing with divorce for desertion is of significance but not conclusive, particularly as sodomy, which is also omitted from the offences barred by condonation, is held to be in the same position as adultery: Statham v. Statham (26), per GREER, L.J. ([1929] P. 145).

I think the key to the problem is to be found in an examination of what is meant by condonation in the legal sense. Since offences condoned are capable of revival condonation is not equivalent to forgiveness in the theological sense. It may be said that it implies merely that the legal remedy for the time being is waived: see Beeby v. Beeby (27) where LORD STOWELL said (1 Hag. Ecc. 793 and 797):

"Now condonation is forgiveness legally releasing the injury . . . In general it is a good plea in bar; it is not fit that a man should sue for a debt which he has released . . ."

Nevertheless, there is always an element of true forgiveness: see Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (6) per VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C. This element involves, in my judgment, the factor of choice. The husband must be held to have made such a choice when he has sexual relations with his wife after his right of action against her has accrued. On the other hand, the choice whether to forgive or not is not open during a current period of desertion to the deserted spouse who is asked to receive back his erring partner. Whether he forgives her or not he must take her back and thereafter her desertion is at an end. If he will not receive her, he becomes himself a deserter. He cannot say: "You have deserted me. I will not forgive you for running away, and, therefore, you cannot return". During the whole of the current period he must affirm the marriage. In the case of a completed period of desertion, now only after the presentation of a petition, in the case of adultery and in that of cruelty, he can disaffirm the marriage as soon as the offence is committed.

Accordingly, in my opinion, as I ventured to suggest in Lane v. Lane (28), when considering a current period of desertion the primary question is: Aye or No, "is it terminated?"—not "is it condoned?" It can be terminated by a resumption of cohabitation involving a mutual or, as it has been called, a bilateral act, or it can be terminated by the deserter returning or even offering to return provided the offer is not one which for some reason the offeree is entitled to refuse, but it is not necessarily terminated as a matter of law by the sexual act. So to hold would, in my judgment, put difficulties in the way of attempted reconciliations, which would be regrettable, and for that reason I think it would be against the public interest if one were driven to such a conclusion. I am glad not to be so driven. At the same time the facts in each case must be carefully considered because if it be found that there has really been a mutual coming together for however short a time it is clear that in such a case desertion has been terminated. The case under consideration is in itself on its own facts not free from difficulty, but I have come to the conclusion that on the facts as found there was no mutuality, and the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Kinch & Richardson, agents for Percy Hughes & Roberts, Birkenhead (for the husband); Treasury Solicitor (for the Queen's Proctor).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

STAPLEY v. GYPSUM MINES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.J.J.), March 13, 14, 17, 18, 19, April 7, 1952.]

Negligence—Breach of statutory duty—Breach fault of deceased jointly with fellow workman—Liability of employers in respect of death of deceased.

The deceased and a fellow workman, both employed by the defendants in their mine, were of equal status, neither being in charge of the other, and both were directed by a foreman of the defendants to bring down an unsafe roof under which they were proposing to work. After attempting unsuccessfully to bring down the roof, they jointly agreed to cease their efforts and to carry on with their normal work. As a result of the unsafe condition of the roof the defendants were in breach of their duty under regs. 7 (3) and 14 (1) of the Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938, and the deceased and his fellow workman were in breach of their duty under reg. 15, the duty in each case being to secure safe conditions in the mine. Shortly after resuming work the deceased was killed by a fall of roof. In an action by his widow against the defendants under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, SELLERS, J., found in her favour on the ground that the defendants were liable for the negligence and/or breach of duty on the part of the deceased's fellow workman and gave judgment for her for half the amount which he would have awarded if the deceased had not been partly responsible. On appeal, HELD: the deceased's own negligence and/or breach of duty, and not that of the defendants, was the substantial cause of the deceased's death; there was no negligence or breach of duty on the part of the deceased's fellow workman for which the defendants could be made responsible; and, therefore, the widow's claim must be dismissed.

AS TO EFFECTIVE CAUSE OF INJURY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 590-594, paras. 843-845; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 24, 25, Nos. 118-124.

Cases referred to:

- A (1) Smith v. Baveystock & Co., Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 531; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Cakebread v. Hopping Bros. (Whetstone), Ltd., [1947] 1 All E.R. 389; [1947] K.B. 641; [1948] L.J.R. 361; 177 L.T. 92; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd., [1939] 3 All E.R. 722; [1940] A.C. 152; 108 L.J.K.B. 779; 161 L.T. 374; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Gallagher v. Dorman, Long & Co., Ltd., [1947] 2 All E.R. 38; 177 L.T. 143; 2nd Digest Supp.
- B (5) Flower v. Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron & Coal Co., [1934] 2 K.B. 132; 103 L.J.K.B. 465; 151 L.T. 87; revsd. on other grounds H.L., [1936] A.C. 206; Digest Supp.
- (6) Dew v. United British S.S. Co., Ltd., (1928), 98 L.J.K.B. 88; 139 L.T. 628; Digest Supp.
- (7) Beal v. Gomme (E.), Ltd., (1949), 65 T.L.R. 543; 2nd Digest Supp.
- C (8) Davies v. Swan Motor Co. (Swansea), Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 620; [1949] 2 K.B. 291; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (9) Harvey v. Road Haulage Executive, [1952] 1 K.B. 120.
- (10) Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd., [1945] 2 All E.R. 547; [1946] K.B. 50; 115 L.J.K.B. 119; 173 L.T. 330; 110 J.P. 76; 2nd Digest Supp.
- D (11) Potts (or Riddell) v. Reid, [1942] 2 All E.R. 161; [1943] A.C. 1; 111 L.J.P.C. 65; 167 L.T. 301; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (12) Lochgelly Iron & Coal Co., Ltd. v. M'ullan, [1934] A.C. 1; 102 L.J.P.C. 123; 149 L.T. 526; 26 B.W.C.C. 463; Digest Supp.
- (13) Lees v. Dunkerley Brothers, [1911] A.C. 5; 80 L.J.K.B. 135; 103 L.T. 467; 4 B.W.C.C. 115; 34 Digest 496, 4096.
- (14) Admiralty Comrs. v. North of Scotland & Orkney & Shetland Steam Navigation Co., Ltd., [1947] 2 All E.R. 350; sub nom. Boy Andrew (Owners), Ltd. v. St. Rognvald (Owners), Ltd., [1948] A.C. 140; [1948] L.J.R. 768; 2nd Digest Supp.
- E (15) Grant v. Sun Shipping Co., Ltd., [1948] 2 All E.R. 238; [1948] A.C. 549; [1949] L.J.R. 727; 2nd Digest Supp.

F APPEAL by the defendants, and CROSS-APPEAL by the plaintiff, from an order of SELLERS, J., dated Dec. 20, 1951, awarding the plaintiff damages for negligence or breach of statutory duty causing the death of the plaintiff's husband, the damages being reduced by one half on account of the fault of the deceased. The plaintiff claimed under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846. The learned judge found in favour of the plaintiff on the ground that the defendants were liable for the negligence or breach of statutory duty of their employee who was working with the deceased, both of whom were charged with the duty of making safe the roof of the mine from the fall of which the deceased met his death.

G Percy Lamb, Q.C., and Friend for the defendants.
Jukes for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

H April 7. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: John Stapley and John Dale were miners who worked together for the defendant company in their gypsum mine. The former was a breaker, and the latter was a borer; they were of equal rank and status; Stapley had considerably longer experience than Dale; he was a good workman, though slow. The place at which they were to work on Aug. 21, 1950, was No. 9 stope; the way to the stope was along that which was known as the twitten. In accordance with their practice they tapped the roof as they approached the stope (where there was a fault) and they found that the roof was drummy, which was an indication that it was dangerous, and that there might be a fall. This is often found after there has been shot-firing. They drew the attention of the foreman to it, and he gave them the order: "Fetch it down", which was understood as meaning: "Do not work under it until you have got it down". For half an hour or so they tried to get it down by using a pick, but they did not succeed, and they decided to get on with their normal work. Dale went into the twitten to bore some holes. If the order had not been given by the foreman—in other words, apart from the danger arising from the roof—Stapley's work would have been to break up the gypsum into small pieces. After half an hour Dale returned to the stope, and, as he did not see any light, he looked for Stapley and found him dead in the stope under a fall of roof. By him there was a pitcher or short drill.

On Nov. 16, 1950, this action was commenced by the widow of Stapley, in which she claimed damages on behalf of herself and her children against her husband's employers alleging negligence and breach of statutory duty. The action was heard by SELLERS, J., at the Lewes Assizes, and on Dec. 20, 1951, he gave judgment for the plaintiff for £1,512 10s. damages, holding that the accident was due to the conduct of both Stapley and Dale in failing to do that which the foreman had told them to do, in failing to report to the foreman, and in deciding together to continue their work with the roof in the state in which they knew it to be. In accordance with these findings, he gave judgment for one half of the amount which he would have awarded if Stapley had not been partly responsible. It is not clear to me whether the finding of the judge is based on negligence or on breach of statutory duty. He did not find in favour of the plaintiff on any of the particulars of claim as originally pleaded, but at the end of the evidence he allowed an amendment which became No. 10 of the particulars, and which is:

"The said Dale, their servant, failed to bring down the said roof by firing or boring holes for firing, and/or failed to report to the said Church [the foreman] his inability to bring down the said roof."

The judgment is founded on this. The defendants appeal to this court against the judgment of SELLERS, J., and there is a cross-appeal by the plaintiff.

It is abundantly clear that at the time of this unfortunate accident both Stapley and Dale were acting contrary to the order of the foreman and in breach of regulations to which I shall have to refer. The judge found that "they were working there as men of equal status as regards this obligation; one was not in charge of the other. They were working together, and it seems to me that they were both responsible for the events which happened, and in those circumstances one can only say that the man Stapley, unfortunately, by his own act, brought about the loss which his widow and children have suffered, but equally so did the act of Dale. Either of them could have avoided this accident if they had done that which it was proper for them both to do."

He accepted the evidence of Dale that they had abandoned any attempt to bring down the roof and had agreed together to carry on with their work. He thought all the facts pointed to the definite view that at the time of the accident Stapley was carrying on with his ordinary work as if the roof under which he was working had been made secure, and was secure. Furthermore, SELLERS, J., was satisfied that both men understood the order given to them by the foreman and that it was their task to take out as much as was necessary to make the roof safe. There were three ways in which that could have been done. They were all known to the two men, and the processes were quite familiar to them.

In his judgment the learned judge says:

"Apparently the customary preparatory way in any event is to use a pick and see if one can get the point of the pick underneath the offending piece

A of roof to loosen it and bring it down. If the roof is more stubborn a pinch-bar may be used to bring it down. That is the second method. The third one is to bore holes and to get a shot-firer, who is of a still higher grade and works in conjunction with these two men, to put his shot in and blast it down, just as the gypsum itself is blasted down. All those three ways were known. It was suggested in the course of this case on behalf of the plaintiff, mainly by the evidence of a witness called Field, that there ought to have been someone there, that Mr. Church ought to have remained there, because of the particular circumstances that prevailed, and superintended the task which he had imposed upon these two men, Stapley and Dale. I did not find Mr. Field a very satisfactory witness. I thought he was too much of the advocate rather than the witness who was speaking as to matters of fact and experience with which he was familiar. I am not of the view that it was in the circumstances necessary for Mr. Church, who had other routine duties to do, to remain there and see this work done. The plea that has been made, that there was a lack of supervision, is rejected by me on the evidence which has been given here."

C This last observation was in regard to the suggestion that this was a bigger fall than usual. The evidence showed that you cannot tell just how much will come down in such a case and that there was nothing unusual. On the evidence I think the judge was right in finding that there was no lack of supervision. Both men were experienced, and their duty was to report to the foreman (or to the shot-firer) if they could not carry out the order they had been given. That seems to be clear from the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff by Dale, Mann and D Jenkinson. The two men worked together, and one or other ought to have reported; neither ought to have worked under the drummy, or faulty, roof.

E The Metalliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938 (S.R. & O., 1938, No. 630) (made under s. 86 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, as applied to Metalliferous Mines by the Mining Industry Act, 1920) were made for the safety of those working in mines of this character, and they impose duties on owners, and on those working in the mine. The most important for the purpose of this case are:

" 7 (3) The roof and sides of every travelling road, outlet and working place shall be made secure, and no person, unless engaged in repairing or investigating the safety of the workings shall travel on or work in any travelling road or working place which is not so made secure . . . "

F " 14 (1) The owner or agent shall carry out the provisions of the Acts, the regulations, and the special rules and to the best of his power enforce the observance thereof, and he shall give such directions as may be necessary to ensure compliance with those provisions and to secure the safety of the mine, and the safety, health and proper discipline of the persons employed . . . (7) If any danger is revealed by the examination or inspection, steps shall be taken at once to remove it and except for that purpose any G person exposed to the danger shall be withdrawn . . . "

H " 15 (1) Every person employed at the mine shall comply with the provisions of the Acts, the regulations and the special rules and any regulations made by the owner or agent in pursuance thereof and with such directions concerning safety and discipline as may be given to him by those in authority over him. (2) Every workman employed in the mine shall, before commencing work, and during the course of it, especially after blasting, make a careful examination of his working place, and so far as practicable remove any or secure any loose rock, stones or ground which might be dangerous. (3) Every person employed at the mine who notices anything that appears unsafe, or likely to cause danger, shall remedy the matter if it is within the scope of his duty, and if not shall withdraw forthwith from the place of danger and report the matter to the owner, agent, or other responsible official . . . (10) No person shall negligently or wilfully do anything likely to endanger life or limb in the mine, or negligently or wilfully omit to do anything necessary for the safety of the mine or of the persons employed therein."

The order given by the foreman was to ensure that reg. 7 (3) was complied with; it was fully understood by both men; it was a direction under reg. 14 (1). In disregarding it the men were in breach of regs. 15 (1) and (3) as well as of reg. 14 (3). The foreman's report (made under reg. 14 (5)) contains the words "men warned of roof and told to dress down and make safe." He said he made the report before he was called to the scene of the accident. Apart from the regulations, it was clear from the evidence of the witnesses, Mann and Jenkinson, called for the plaintiff, and the foreman, Church, called on behalf of the defendants, that no man ought to work under a roof such as this had been found to be or after the order which had been given.

What, then, was the cause of Stapley's death? It can be put in more than one way. It was caused by a fall of roof at the place at which he was working. He and his companion knew of the condition of the roof, and had been given an order to bring it down. In deciding on the course they took they acted in disregard to the regulations and in disobedience of the order, and in going to work under that roof in its dangerous condition Stapley was exposing himself to the very danger which regs. 7 (3) and 15 (3) are designed to avoid. Thus, it can fairly be said that Stapley's death was brought about by his breach of the regulations, and, particularly, by his going to work under a faulty roof after the order which had been given. SELLERS, J., considered that it was equally through the act of Dale, and on that ground he held that the employers were responsible in the action to the extent of one half of the damages which would have been recoverable if Stapley had not been at fault.

I will consider the claim based on negligence first. Stapley and Dale, having failed to get the roof down with a pick, decided to carry on. "It was an agreement between us", said Dale. The judge found that they had abandoned any attempt to bring down the roof and had agreed together to carry on with their work. How, then, can there be any question of negligence between the two? There is no liability for negligence unless there is in the particular case a legal duty to take care, and this duty must be one which is owed to the injured party and not merely to others. Stapley by his agreement, or arrangement, with Dale appears to me to have absolved Dale from any duty of care towards him in regard to this roof. I do not think that if Stapley had suffered injury as a result he could have recovered damages against Dale in an action based on negligence, and a claim against the employers on the ground of negligence by Dale would meet with the like answer. For those reasons I do not consider that the claim can succeed in so far as it is based on negligence.

The claim based on breach of statutory duty presents more difficulty. In Smith v. Baveystock & Co., Ltd. (1) the court had to consider a claim by an experienced circular saw operator, one of whose fingers passed under the guard and was injured. It was contended on his behalf that, though the adjustment of the guard was left to him, it remained the adjustment of the employers, for which they must take the responsibility if the operator suffered injury thereby. The court concluded that there had been no breach of statutory duty, but it is interesting to see that LORD GODDARD, in the course of his judgment, said of the plaintiff ([1945] 1 All E.R. 534):

"He cannot take advantage of his own wrong and say to his employer: 'Although you left me to adjust it and I did not adjust it, therefore I am going to claim damages against you'."

And DU PARCQ, L.J., said, on the assumption that there had been a breach of statutory duty (ibid., 535):

"I think [the defendants] are entitled to say: 'The fault is really yours and not ours. We were quite entitled to rely on you. True, if somebody else had been injured by any failure on your part to fulfil your obligation we should have had to pay the penalty, we should have been responsible to him. We cannot rid ourselves of our obligation. But it is quite absurd to think that if you, who are really the person to blame because you were reasonably and properly entrusted by us with this duty, failed to carry it out, therefore, we have got to pay damages to you'."

A Stapley and Dale were both men of experience; they knew what was to be done, and they knew how to do it; they did not need supervision. If Stapley alone had been responsible for the breach of statutory duty, I think it is clear that his widow could not have recovered damages, but it is said that the accident was due equally to the conduct of Dale, and that for that the employers are responsible. It is true to say that no one can waive the performance of a statutory

B duty. Still, is a man who is injured through breach of a duty which he owes to all others working in a mine in a better position as against his employers if he can say: "Yes, I acted in complete disregard to the regulations, but I did so in agreement with another employee" ? It ought not to be so. If ten men working together in a mine come to an arrangement that they will pay no heed to statutory regulations and all ten are injured as a result of a joint breach, are they all

C entitled to damages against the mine owners ? I cannot help feeling that, if such a position arose, damages ought not to be recoverable, for the injuries would be the result of an illegal agreement or of an agreement to do something in breach of regulations made for the safety of all persons working in the mine.

However, no such point as this was pleaded or argued. Counsel for the D defendants submitted that the death of Stapley was caused by his own breach of statutory duty, and that it mattered not that another man was a party to the breach. Each was an experienced man, and each owed a duty to himself and to the employers, as well as to other workmen. Each was under a duty to report. Moreover, Stapley himself went into the place of danger and was killed. That was a further breach of duty by Stapley, it was said, and the fact that the two men had decided to leave the roof and continue with their ordinary work

E did not affect the position. There is great force in this submission. On the other hand, it is claimed that the employers (through Dale) were in breach of the regulations, or of their statutory duty, as the judge found. If this is the right view, it becomes necessary to consider s. 1 (1), of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. "Fault" in that section includes breach of statutory duty, and thus, if the plaintiff has a right to damages, the damages recoverable

F are to be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage. The action is against employers, and questions arise beyond those which normally arise when it is a case of deciding the responsibility of the drivers of two motor cars which have come into collision. One has to consider the responsibility of a man who was properly entrusted with the performance of a statutory duty and who decided

G not to perform it. Can it be said that his responsibility is less because his decision was arrived at by arrangement with a man of equal rank ? There was nothing more the employers could reasonably be expected to do. As between Stapley and them the responsibility for the damage was surely on Stapley unless it can be said that it was reduced to some small extent because of the agreement between him and Dale. I do not see that it can be right to say that Stapley's

H responsibility is only one half. I should regard him as wholly, or almost wholly, responsible in considering the position as between him and the employers, and if I had to decide the question under s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1945, I should not place more than a nominal proportion of the responsibility on the employers, though I observe that TUCKER, L.J., in Cakebread v. Hopping Bros. (Whetstone), Ltd. (2) appears to have thought ([1947] 1 All E.R. 395) that in such circumstances ninety per cent. of the blame might fall on the workman and ten per cent. on the employer. I appreciate that there is a statutory duty on the employers, but if they have properly placed on the employee the task of performing it, and the failure is his, I do not see why their proportion of the responsibility should be more than nominal. To place a higher proportion on them would not seem to be just and equitable. Thus, whichever way I look at the case, I feel that the claim ought not to succeed, for nominal damages would not help the plaintiff.

In Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (3) LORD WRIGHT, having described an action for breach of statutory duty as a common law action based on the purpose of the statute to protect the workman and as belonging to the category often described as strict or absolute liability, said, in speaking of contributory negligence as a defence to such an action ([1939] 3 All E.R. 739):

“If the matter had been free from authority I should, I think, have thought it simpler to hold that a workman’s claim for injury caused by breach of the employer’s statutory duty to fence and like duties, is only barred by blameworthy conduct on the man’s part of such gravity and so directly causing the accident as in the judgment of the judge or jury to be properly described as the substantial cause of the accident and to shift the responsibility to him.”

The conduct of Stapley appears to me to fall within these words. Moreover, Stapley acted in breach of the regulations, and it was his act, in working under the faulty roof, after the order which had been given to him, which brought about his death.

The plaintiff’s position in this action is just the same as would have been that of her husband if he had survived and had brought an action against his employers, and the more I consider it the more I am driven to the conclusion that the action ought not to succeed. I do not overlook the fact that the two men had decided to get on with their work in the belief (or in the hope) that the roof would not fall. The regulations are for the general safety of those who work in a place of this kind, and if two men of equal status arrange to disregard them and injury results to one as a result, he cannot blame his employers; it is his fault and not theirs; the real cause of the injury is not their breach of statutory duty; it is his. For the reasons I have given I would allow the appeal of the defendants and dismiss the cross-appeal of the plaintiff, as to which I need say nothing further having regard to the view I have expressed. In my opinion, judgment should be entered for the defendants.

BIRKETT, L.J.: The facts in these two appeals have been fully stated in the judgment that has just been delivered, and it is not necessary to repeat them. Both appeals are concerned with the same questions and may be thus stated. On the facts of this case, are the defendants liable to the plaintiff, and, if so, for what amount of damages?

The claim was made for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty, and in the particulars delivered with the statement of claim the allegations of negligence and breaches of statutory duty were fully set out under nine separate headings. The statement of claim was amended when the final speech of the learned counsel for the plaintiff was nearing its close, and was made at the suggestion, and, indeed, the insistence, of the learned judge. Counsel for the plaintiff had submitted that the amendment was not necessary, but ultimately he asked leave to amend. That amendment indicates very clearly the view taken by the learned judge, and reads in this way: “The said Dale, their servant, failed to bring down the roof by firing or boring holes for firing, and/or failed to report to the said Church, the foreman, his inability to bring down the said roof.” The liability of the defendants is thus founded by the learned judge on the breach of duty by Dale, although he held that the breach of duty by Stapley deprived the plaintiff of half the amount of damages she would otherwise have been awarded.

The first important question to be answered is whether the breach of duty in the circumstances of this case can give a cause of action to the plaintiff against

A the defendants. It is submitted by counsel for the defendants that the breach of duty of Dale cannot do so. SELLERS, J., found that Dale and Stapley were equal in status, and that one of them was not in charge of the other. He also found that they were working together; that they were both responsible for the events which happened; that Stapley by his own act brought about the loss which his widow and children suffered, but equally so did the act of Dale; and that either of them could have avoided this accident if they had done that which it was proper for them both to do. He came to these findings because he was satisfied that both men had seen that the roof was drummy, and they both understood that it was their job to obey the order of Church to "fetch it down" in order to make the roof safe. The learned judge said:

B "It seems to me that the real fault bringing about this most regrettable accident was the conduct of both Stapley and Dale in failing to do that which the foreman Church had told them to do; or if they could not have done that, in failing to report to Church that they could not get it down; or perhaps more important still, in deciding together to continue their work with the roof in the state which they knew it to be."

C On this last point, which the judge thought was "perhaps more important still", he said:

D "It seems to me that when Stapley, having discussed the matter with Dale, decided to continue his ordinary work . . . he went on to work in a place which was not made secure, and that there was in fact a breach of reg. 7 (3), but it was a breach, of course, brought about by the act of Stapley himself . . ."

Both men were presumed to know the regulations, and the evidence of Dale supports and confirms this.

E I am of opinion that, had the facts of the case been that Stapley alone was concerned in the events that happened, the plaintiff could not have succeeded in her action against the defendants. The breach of statutory duty by the defendants would have been a breach solely because of the breach by Stapley to whom the statutory duty had been properly delegated. His failure to obey the lawful orders of Church, the foreman, to bring the drummy roof down, or to report the actual state of affairs to Church, and to avoid working under the roof until it had been brought down, would have defeated the plaintiff's claim altogether. At one stage of the case counsel for the plaintiff conceded this, but was later inclined to withdraw from it. The defendants, in my opinion, would not be liable to the plaintiff, because the breach of duty complained of in the employers was the breach of duty by Stapley himself.

F In Gallagher v. Dorman, Long & Co., Ltd. (4) WROTTESELEY, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, which was composed of LORD GREENE, M.R., LYNSEY, J., and himself, said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 41):

G "Where, however, the person injured as a result of the breach of the statutory duty is the employee to whom the employer has properly delegated the performance of that duty, and the breach of duty is caused by the act or omission of such employee, such employee cannot be heard to say that his injury was caused by the breach of the statutory duty and not caused by his own act or omission: Smith v. Baveystock & Co., Ltd. (1)."

H In claims for breach of statutory duty against employers, if the person injured or killed was himself the actual offender, the employers would not be liable to him or to his representatives. Further, contributory negligence is a defence to a claim against an employer for breach of statutory duty (though since June 15, 1945, the defence may be limited); and, of course, in any particular case the contributory negligence may not be co-extensive with the breach of duty.

Various cases were referred to in the argument before us—in particular, Flower v. Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron & Coal Co. (5). In the Court of Appeal, which upheld the judgment of LAWRENCE, J., SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1934] 2 K.B. 145):

"As to the question of law, in my opinion this court is bound by its own decision in Dew v. United British S.S. Co., Ltd. (6), in which all the members of the court, as I read the judgments, stated that contributory negligence of a plaintiff was a defence to an action for an admitted breach of a statute . . . Holding as I do that there was evidence on which the learned judge could find that there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and not therefore being able to interfere with his decision to that effect, I am still less able to interfere with it when he adds that the act which he has found to be negligent was also in breach of definite instructions. For these reasons, I think the learned judge came to the right conclusion when he declined to give the verdict for the plaintiff on the ground that the damage of which the plaintiff complained was substantially caused by his own contributory negligence and breach of instructions."

In Cakebread v. Hopping Bros. (Whetstone), Ltd. (2) comes the passage to which my Lord has already made reference ([1947] 1 All E.R. 395), and I only refer to it for this reason, that in that case there is a paragraph in the headnote which reads:

"Per TUCKER, L.J.: Different considerations might arise in a case where there was no breach of statutory duty on the part of the employers, the workman having himself failed to adjust properly a properly constructed guard and there being adequate supervision in the factory. Assuming, without deciding, that any question of contribution by the employers could arise under the Act of 1945, in such a case, blame might be apportionable as to ninety per cent. on the workman."

It is quite plain from that case, and from another case which TUCKER, L.J., decided, namely, Beal v. E. Gomme, Ltd. (7), that in that case TUCKER, L.J., was emphasising the importance of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, as it might conceivably affect these cases. The learned lord justice said in Beal's case (7):

"I do not think it necessary to express a view, as to the effect, if any, of reg. 23. I think that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed very materially to the injuries that he suffered. I do not think that it is a ninety-nine per cent. case . . ."

for the reasons which he gives. So, in addition to the passage cited by my Lord, where the learned lord justice had spoken about ninety per cent., he also has in mind that what my Lord referred to as the nominal damages might amount to ninety-nine per cent., and all that would appear, in his view, to turn on the meaning of the Act of 1945.

I am further of opinion that, if both Stapley and Dale had been killed in the circumstances of the present case in doing together what Stapley did alone when he resumed work under the roof and the widows of Dale and Stapley had brought separate actions against the defendants, both actions would have failed. On the findings of fact by SELLERS, J., both actions could not be distinguished from a case where only one man was concerned, and where that man was solely responsible for the breach of duty. On the decision of SELLERS, J., in the present case it would seem that both widows could recover half of the damages suffered, the widow of Dale alleging breach of statutory duty by the employers through Stapley, and the widow of Stapley alleging breach of statutory duty through Dale, but both widows failing to recover the whole amount because of the particular breach of duty by Stapley and Dale in resuming work under the still drummy roof that they had failed to fetch down. The passage in the judgment that would seem to bring about this result is :

"Substantially the employers here are responsible for the negligence of their servant Dale in this matter, and the result, as I see it, is that the accident to Stapley was brought about by the separate acts of negligence of himself and Dale, and that both he and the employers must be held responsible therefor."

This passage is a little obscure. It may mean that SELLERS, J., is saying that the negligence of Dale was the reason the roof fell, and the death of Stapley was due to the fall of the roof, but Stapley's negligence was to be found in his working under the roof at the time the roof actually fell, or it may mean that Stapley's disobedience to the orders of Church to fetch the roof down and Dale's disobedience in the same matter are to be regarded as "separate acts" and they are both equally responsible for the fact that Stapley resumed work under a drummy roof, but Stapley was additionally responsible for resuming work under the drummy roof. It is necessary to use words with some precision of meaning when considering the cause of this accident to Stapley. It may be said that the fall of the roof was the "cause" of the accident, and that fall was due to the disobedience of Dale to the orders of Church, for had he obeyed the order and brought the roof down, no accident would have happened, and, therefore, Dale cannot be dismissed from any consideration of the "cause" of the accident. The amendment of the statement of claim makes the defendants responsible for Dale's failure to bring the roof down and his failure to report, although the learned judge says in his judgment:

"I think that is so; I think he (Dale) did, but I think also so did Stapley . . . and the employers must be held to some extent liable for it."

He was there referring to the breach of reg. 7 (3).

Now, there is no doubt that the men were charged with the statutory duty jointly, and the learned judge so finds. Whatever may be attributed to Dale by way of breach of duty can be attributed to Stapley with equal force. If Stapley had not failed in his statutory duty the drummy roof would have been brought down whatever Dale did or did not do. Why, then, because one of the two men is killed should the breach of duty be attributed to Dale the survivor in order to make the employers liable? It was a joint duty, not the duty of Dale alone, but by the amendment the learned judge indicated that he was deciding the case as though Stapley had nothing to do with the breach of duty that resulted in the drummy roof being left without being brought down, though he recognised that Stapley was equally to blame. The two men had mutually agreed to disobey the orders of Church, and in so doing they committed offences against the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Acts of 1872 and 1875, punishable by fine and imprisonment. It seems to me to be impossible to say that the employers were guilty of a breach of statutory duty because of the default of Dale without saying in the same breath that they were at the same time guilty of the same breach because of the default of Stapley.

But I think this appeal can be decided on another ground. It seems clear that if the inquiry to be made is: What was the cause of Stapley's death?, then the answer must be that it was his own breach of duty in resuming work under the drummy roof. If he had not done that, it is obvious that he would not have been killed. The contributory negligence of Stapley would be a good defence to a claim made against the employers for breach of statutory duty, and it would have to be considered whether there was any other contributory cause. As LORD WRIGHT said in Caswell's case (3) ([1939] 3 All E.R. 740), some carelessness or inattention is not enough, for then the breach of the statute is the effective cause of the injury. But in the present case the effective cause of the death was because Stapley resumed work in breach of the order given by Church, with knowledge that the drummy roof had not been brought down, but with the knowledge that drummy roofs were dangerous, notwithstanding his erroneous view that because the roof would not come down with the methods he and Dale had employed (and without calling on the shot-firer to bring the roof down) the roof might be regarded as safe. That the roof was in fact dangerous permits of no doubt, for it came down of itself with disastrous results within thirty minutes.

In Davies v. Swan Motor Co. (Swansea), Ltd. (8) DENNING, L.J., said ([1949] 2 K.B. 323):

"The plaintiff's negligence in leaving the obstruction there is a continuous negligence, which continues after the oncoming driver sees it. But the fact that he does see it may mean in some cases that the obstruction is not the cause of the accident. For instance in the case I have put it is, of course, plain that if the defendant actually saw the parked vehicle in good time and purposely ran into it—or, indeed, what comes to the same thing, if he, seeing its position, drove recklessly on that account, careless whether he hit it or not—his conduct would be so powerful a factor in producing the damage that the presence of the parked vehicle would not be itself a cause of the damage. The sole cause could be the purposeful or reckless act of the defendant."

Then the learned lord justice goes on to deal with the situation if it was not so deliberate. In Harvey v. Road Haulage Executive (9) DENNING, L.J., uses the same language, and he adds further words to the same effect.

If the true test is: Who caused the death? (see SALMOND ON THE LAW OF TORTS, 10th ed., p. 452), then the answer must be: Stapley himself, and Stapley alone.

Before the passing of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, no court could have found the defendants liable on these facts: see Smith v. Baveystock & Co., Ltd. (1) and Vyner v. Waldenberg Bros., Ltd. (10). That Act has said that, if the plaintiff's negligence is one of the causes of his damage, he does not fail altogether. His damages are reduced. The negligence and breach of duty of Stapley are clear. The breach of duty on the part of the employers arises because they delegated the duty to two men who deliberately disobeyed the lawful orders of Church, and Stapley was one of them. When the duty is imposed on two jointly its breach is a joint tort. The duty is imposed on employers, and they may delegate it to two jointly. Can it be said that the employers are liable because Dale was guilty of breach of duty, and, therefore, the defendants are liable to Stapley, who was equally the delegate of the employers and equally the person guilty of breach of duty? I am of opinion that the effective cause of Stapley's death was his own breach of statutory duty, or, alternatively, his own negligence and any breach of duty by Dale, even if it should be held that it was Dale's breach of duty that left the roof in a dangerous state, was no contribution to the death of Stapley in any legal definition of that term. Without the fall of the roof, of course, there could have been no death, and in that sense the fall of the roof contributed to the accident. But the view I take is that the breach of duty in not bringing the roof down was equally that of Stapley, and for the purpose of this case may be regarded as solely that of Stapley, when it is the widow of Stapley claiming damages against the defendants; and, in any event, the cause of the death of Stapley was the breach of duty in resuming work under the drummy roof when he had been ordered not to do so: see Flower v. Ebbw Vale Steel, Iron & Coal Co., Ltd. (5).

I think the appeal of the plaintiff fails altogether. Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty because of inadequate supervision. I think the finding of SELLERS, J., disposes of this. He submitted that the order of Church to "fetch down the roof" was given to Dale alone and not to Stapley. The evidence is overwhelmingly against any such contention, as is the judge's finding, but it is significant that the submission is made.

It follows that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed for the full amount of damages awarded by the learned judge, and that the damages are not inordinately low, inasmuch as, in my opinion, the plaintiff is entitled to none. I would allow the appeal of the defendants, and dismiss the appeal of the plaintiff.

MORRIS, L.J.: There are two ways in which liability is said to fall on the defendants. One is that they were themselves in breach of their statutory duties, and the other is that Dale was in breach of his statutory duties and that the defendants are vicariously liable. On the findings of fact of the learned judge there can be no doubt that there were breaches of statutory duty. It becomes necessary to examine what they were and how they arose, and to consider whether any of such breaches caused the death of Stapley.

It has been laid down in a series of decisions in the House of Lords that an employer's obligation to comply with statutory provisions for the safety of his employees is, in general, absolute. An employer does not relieve himself of his obligation by showing that he has appointed reasonably competent persons to perform the obligation, but that they failed to do so. Furthermore, as LORD PORTER said in Potts (or Riddell) v. Reid (11) ([1942] 2 All E.R. 176):

"... negligence is the failure to use the requisite amount of care required by the law in the case where a duty to use care exists. At common law the degree required is that expected of the 'reasonable man'. When a statutory duty is imposed, if it be absolute, the degree required is the fulfilment of the statutory obligation. If it be not fulfilled, the person upon whom the duty is imposed is negligent . . ."

In the earlier case of Lochgelly Iron & Coal Co., Ltd. v. M'Mullan (12) LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE said as follows ([1934] A.C. 13):

"Section 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, is in the following terms:—'The roof and sides of every travelling road and working place shall be made secure, and a person shall not, unless appointed for the purpose of exploring or repairing, travel on or work in any travelling road or working place which is not so made secure.' This involves, it will be noted, an absolute obligation on the owner to make secure the roof and sides referred to, and a further obligation that no person shall work in a travelling road or working place which is not so made secure. As to the law on the subject of the liability of owners for breach of obligations imposed by statute for the protection of those employed by them, I think the following propositions are supported by authority:— (1) If the obligation is to do or abstain from doing a particular thing and on the construction of the statute the obligation is created for the protection of a particular class, e.g., workers in a mine or factory, then a member of that class injured by the non-performance of the obligation is entitled to sue the owner in an ordinary action founded on personal negligence. (2) The fact that the obligation has not been performed is in itself evidence of personal negligence on the part of the owner. (3) That the owner cannot relieve himself of his obligation by saying that he has appointed reasonably competent persons and that the breach is due to negligence on their part, nor was it open to him at common law to plead common employment. (4) There appears to be no material difference in this respect between the law of England and that of Scotland."

In the same case LORD ATKIN said (ibid., 10):

"If in violation of the statute the roof was not made secure, the failure to perform the statutory duty was negligence either of the employer or of his servants. No one can I think doubt that if the obligation to observe statutory precautions is imposed upon a servant, the servant's breach is negligence. The servant would be liable to his fellow servant for injuries caused by such breach: see Lees v. Dunkerley Brothers (13)."

Now, the facts of the present case show that the defendants were in breach of statutory duty. They did not comply with regs. 14 (1) and 7 (3) of the Metaliferous Mines General Regulations, 1938. The roof of the working place was not made secure. The facts as found further show that Stapley and Dale were in breach of statutory duty. They were in breach of the duties in the circumstances imposed on them by reg. 15, paras. (1), (2), (3) and (10).

If negligence or breach of statutory duty is established, it next becomes necessary to consider whether the death of Stapley was caused thereby, for, as LORD MACMILLAN said in Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (3) ([1939] 3 All E.R. 732):

"The mere fact that at the time of an accident to a miner his employers can be shown to have been in breach of a statutory duty is clearly not enough in itself to impose liability on the employers. It must be shown that the accident was causally associated with the breach of statutory duty."

The defendants, being a limited company, could only perform their duties by appointing persons to carry out those duties. In the present case they appointed Dale and Stapley. If Dale and Stapley failed to carry out the duties, it would follow that the defendants failed to comply with their statutory obligations, and if as a result some injury were caused to some other person, the defendants would make no answer in law by saying that they had reposed confidence in the reliability and competence of the two men. The problem which is raised in the present case concerns the position of the defendants where, following on a failure of the two men to do what they were instructed to do, mischance has befallen one of them. It is a melancholy feature of the case that the facts show, as the learned judge held, that disaster would not have overtaken Stapley had he and Dale done that which they ought to have done. The matter must be examined and decided on that footing even though the view may be held that Stapley, who was described by the learned judge as a good, steady workman, may have been well-motivated and may have been urged by zeal for his work. Here was no case of irresponsible, or impetuous, or contumacious conduct. The distressing circumstance remains that he in fact disobeyed an order to dislodge the unsafe roof with the corollary or the implied order not to proceed to do ordinary work under the roof until it was made safe.

I proceed to consider the matter on the basis that it was fitting for the defendants to entrust the task of coping with the unsafe roof to Dale and Stapley. This assumption requires testing in view of some of the submissions advanced on behalf of the plaintiff. If Dale and Stapley were inept, or inexperienced, or ill-qualified to make the roof secure, then different considerations might apply.

Dealing first with the defendants' breach of their statutory obligations, the matter can fairly be tested by considering the position on the assumption that Stapley alone had been required to make the roof safe, that that was a proper arrangement, and that Stapley had been injured, but not killed, all other circumstances being as found by the learned judge. If Stapley had claimed damages and had asserted that he was hurt because the roof was not made secure, he would have been met by the answer that the roof was insecure only because he had failed to carry out a legitimate instruction to him to make it secure. In reason and in common sense it seems to me that such answer would effectively dispose of his claim. If the above assumptions be varied to include, as was the fact, that Dale and Stapley together were told to make the roof safe, then a claim by Stapley would have been met by a similar answer. Would it have availed Stapley to reply that though he may have failed, so also had Dale? On the findings of the learned judge as to their respective obligations (which findings I see no reason to reject), then, in my judgment, the answer is in the negative. The learned judge said:

"... I have considered the evidence, and while, taking their respective duties, one may have been more highly skilled, I think they were working there as men of equal status as regards this obligation; one was not in charge of the other. They were working together, and it seems to me that they were both responsible for the events which happened, and, in those circumstances, one can only say that the man Stapley, unfortunately by his own act, brought about the loss which his widow and children have suffered, but equally so did the act of Dale. Either of them could have avoided this accident if they had done that which it was proper for them both to do."

Accepting these findings as set out in the careful judgment of the learned judge, I do not find myself sharing the view that the conclusion to be drawn is that, as two men were instructed and as they both failed, the employers should be liable to the extent of one half of the loss suffered by one of them. There were no duties imposed on Dale which were wider than, or different from, or more extensive than, those imposed on Stapley. The responsibilities of the two men, as regards making the roof secure, were co-extensive. No greater fault or failure can be imputed to Dale than to Stapley, nor any fault or failure which was not also, and to the same extent, that of Stapley. In these circumstances, in a suit by Stapley the same answer would avail his employers as would have availed them if there had not been anyone jointly appointed with Stapley to make the roof secure.

In my judgment, the cause of Stapley's death was that an insecure roof fell on him. If it can be asserted that the defendants were in breach of statutory duty in failing to make the roof secure, so that the death "was causally associated with the breach of statutory duty", then the effect and degree of Stapley's contributory negligence would have to be considered. His "share in the responsibility" would require assessment. But before this stage is reached it must be shown that Stapley would (if death had not ensued) have been entitled to sue and recover damages in respect of the defendants' breach of statutory duty. It is relevant to bear in mind the wording of s. 1 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846. It is as follows:

" . . . Whosoever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony."

In my judgment, Stapley could not have asserted as against the defendants that they were in breach of statutory duty if the reason for so asserting was that Stapley had neglected to do that which he was properly told to do. Nor could he so assert by saying that someone else shared his fault if the responsibilities of that other person merely marched with his and did not overlap or overtop them.

It is necessary to consider whether it was legitimate to have detailed Dale and Stapley for the task of making the roof secure. It was pleaded that there was a failure properly to supervise Stapley. As to this the learned judge said:

"I am not of the view that it was in the circumstances necessary for Mr. Church, who had other routine duties to do, to remain there and see this work done. The plea that has been made, that there was a lack of supervision, is rejected by me on the evidence which has been given here."

From the way in which this topic is dealt with by the learned judge, I form the view that a somewhat different emphasis on the matter was placed as the argument developed before us. It was said that Dale had not had experience of boring on the site of a fault, and had not previously had to bring down a faulty roof so located, with the result that on the occasion in question he was presented with a problem to cope with which he was ill-equipped. The testimony of Mr. Mann was to the effect that Dale and Stapley should not have been left on their own to get down the faulty roof, and that they lacked the necessary experience. The evidence of Mr. Church, on the other hand, was that Dale and Stapley had previously coped with a roof in exactly similar circumstances, and that the task he gave them was not beyond the scope of their duties during a normal day's work. The learned judge considered the evidence with care, and I think that it must be regarded as implicit in what he holds that he rejected the view that it was not legitimate to have entrusted the duty of dealing with the roof to Dale and Stapley. A

It has next to be considered whether the defendants can be held vicariously responsible for breaches of statutory obligation personal to Dale as opposed to those personal to themselves. A convenient way of testing the matter is on the supposition that Stapley, having been injured but not killed, sued Dale for damages. On the facts as found by the learned judge, it would seem to be somewhat surprising if Stapley could have recovered against Dale. In approaching this matter it is desirable to do so, in the first place, by considering whether there is any liability in Dale. It is only if there is some liability in Dale that it becomes necessary to consider the extent of the contributory negligence of Stapley. The opening words of s. 1 of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, are: B

"Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person . . ."

The word "fault" is defined by s. 4 of the Act to mean C

"negligence, breach of statutory duty or other act or omission which gives rise to a liability in tort or would, apart from this Act, give rise to the defence of contributory negligence." D

It must, accordingly, first be decided whether, if Stapley had been injured but not killed, the other facts being as found, he could successfully have sued Dale by asserting that Dale's breach of statutory duty gave rise to a liability in him in tort to Stapley. If it did, then in the present case Stapley's share in the responsibility for the damage might be regarded as so considerable as to reduce Dale's liability to a small fraction of what it otherwise might be. But before any such inquiry is reached it has to be established that there is liability in Dale. Stapley's own conduct has now to be regarded from the point of view of causation. Could Stapley assert as against Dale that he was injured because Dale failed to carry out his statutory obligations? In my judgment, he could not. Dale and Stapley had duties imposed on them jointly, and there was no failure on Dale's part which was not also and equally a failure on Stapley's part. The result is that Stapley could not point to any omission or dereliction on Dale's part which was not fully and wholly his own, and, accordingly, he could not assert that Dale had caused his injuries. Stapley would be in the difficulty that he could not prove that it was Dale's error of omission rather than his own error of omission that brought about his injuries. E

In giving evidence Dale used the word "agreement" in reference to the event when he and Stapley abandoned the task of bringing down the roof and proceeded with their ordinary work. I do not consider that their "agreement" should be considered as denoting more than their concurrence in a joint decision to abandon their duty to make the roof secure. But thereafter any injury resulting to one or both because the roof was not made secure was no more attributable to the breach of statutory duty of the one than of the other. There was no element of causation emanating from Dale that did not also emanate from Stapley. Neither, therefore, could prove that any injury was caused by the omission of the other. Applying the test approved by VISCOUNT SIMON in his speech in the Boy Andrew case (14) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 353), and by LORD DU F

PARCQ in his speech in Grant v. Sun Shipping Co., Ltd. (15) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 246), the inquiry becomes one as to whether Stapley could show that Dale's breach of statutory duty had anything to do with causing Stapley's injuries. It seems to me that where Stapley's own conduct by way of non-feasance provides a totality of cause, it cannot be demonstrated by Stapley that Dale's non-feasance came into account or had any effect. Stapley could not discharge the burden which would be on him of proving that his injuries were either wholly or partly caused by Dale. There does not appear to be evidence of any negligent conduct in Dale other than that comprehended within his breaches of statutory duty. No acts of commission are alleged against him, nor are omissions, beyond those equally and concurrently attributable to Stapley. For the reasons which I have indicated, I have felt impelled to the conclusion that there could be no recovery at the suit of the plaintiff against the defendants.

Appeal allowed; cross-appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Blyth, Dutton, Wright & Bennett, agents for Menneer, Idle & Brackett, St. Leonards-on-Sea (for the defendants); Rowley, Ashworth & Co. (for the plaintiff).
[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re POZOT'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. WESTMINSTER BANK, LTD. v. GUERBOIS AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), March 24, 25, 26, 1952.]

Will—Forfeiture clause—Income payable until vested in some other person—Beneficiary an enemy—Payment of income to Custodian of Enemy Property—Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939 (c. 89), s. 7 (1)—Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1198), art. 1 (i) (ii).

By her will, dated Feb. 16, 1937, a testatrix, who died on June 6, 1941, directed, in exercise of a power of appointment conferred on her by her marriage settlement, that the trustees should pay the income of an equal one-third share of the trust funds to G. during her life " . . . unless some act or event shall have been done or happened during my life whereby if the same income belonged absolutely to her such income or some part thereof would at my death be or become vested in or charged in favour of some [other] person or until some act or event shall be done or happen within twenty-one years after my death whereby if the same income belonged absolutely to her such income or some part thereof would have become so vested or charged . . . " On the failure or determination during the life of G. of the said trust the trustees were directed to hold the said income on other trusts. At all material times the testatrix and G., being resident in the south of France, were, by virtue of the Trading with the Enemy Order, 1940, "enemies" within the meaning of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 2 (1).

HELD: the term "vested" as used in the will had the significance of the passing of some proprietary interest and related to the life interest given to G.; the Act of 1939 (having regard especially to s. 7 (1) thereof) and the orders made thereunder (in particular the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939), made a clear distinction between vesting and payment; by art. 1 (i) and (ii) of the order of 1939 the income which would have been payable to G. was payable to the Custodian of Enemy Property, but the proprietary right to the life interest did not vest in the Custodian, whose right to receive the income depended essentially on the circumstance that the proprietary interest was vested in an enemy; and, therefore, the condition for the operation of the forfeiture clause had not arisen.

Fraenkel v. Whitty ([1947] 2 All E.R. 646), overruled.

FOR THE TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT, 1939, s. 7, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 26, p. 337.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Fraenkel v. Whitty, [1947] 2 All E.R. 646; [1948] Ch. 55; [1948] L.J.R. 322; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Re Westby's Settlement, [1950] 1 All E.R. 479; [1950] Ch. 296; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Re Greenwood, [1901] 1 Ch. 887; 70 L.J.Ch. 326; 84 L.T. 118; 44 Digest 1234, 10665.
- (4) Coverdale v. Charlton, (1878), 4 Q.B.D. 104; 48 L.J.Q.B. 128; 40 L.T. 88; 43 J.P. 268; 43 Digest 386, 116.
- (5) Re Münster, [1920] 1 Ch. 268; 89 L.J.Ch. 138; Digest Supp.
- (6) Re Gourju's Will Trusts, [1942] 2 All E.R. 605; [1943] Ch. 24; 112 L.J.Ch. 75; 168 L.T. 1; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Re Hall, [1943] 2 All E.R. 753; [1944] Ch. 46; 113 L.J.Ch. 76; 169 L.T. 387; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (8) Re Sartoris's Estate, [1892] 1 Ch. 11; 61 L.J.Ch. 1; 65 L.T. 544; 5 Digest 666, 5914.

APPEAL by the third and fourth defendants to an originating summons against an order of VAISEY, J., dated May 1, 1951.

Following Fraenkel v. Whitty (1), VAISEY, J., held that by virtue of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and the orders made under s. 7 thereof, the income of certain trust funds had become vested in a person other than the appointees under the will of Doris Muriel Guerbois, deceased, and, therefore, the defeasance clause in the said will operated to determine the interests of the appointees.

C. Montgomery White, Q.C., and E. G. Wright for the third and fourth defendants, two of the daughters of the testatrix.

Pennycuik, Q.C., and W. F. Waite for the infant defendants, the grandchildren of the testatrix.

Droop for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the marriage settlement of the testatrix.

The first and second defendants (the parents of the infant defendants) were not represented.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The first point raised in this case is in form an appeal from VAISEY, J., but in substance it is an appeal from ROXBURGH, J., in Fraenkel v. Whitty (1). The question, put briefly, is whether the effect of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939, of Sept. 16, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1198), as amended, operated in the circumstances of the present case to cause a forfeiture of the life interests appointed by the will of Madame Doris Muriel Guerbois (to whom I will refer hereafter as "Doris"), pursuant to the terms of the settlement made on her first marriage (with M. Francis Louis Frederic Pozot) in which the proceedings are entitled? If this question is answered affirmatively (as VAISEY, J., answered it, following the decision of ROXBURGH, J., in Fraenkel v. Whitty (1)), a further question arises on the construction of the will of Doris, by which the appointment was made, as to the present effect of that forfeiture.

The settlement on the first marriage of Doris is dated Aug. 2, 1910, and was made pursuant to an order of EVE, J., under the Infant Settlements Act, 1855. By the effect of it, so far as relevant, certain funds (specified in the schedule to the settlement and now worth, we are informed, some £12,000) were settled so that the income of the fund was payable to Doris for her life and subject thereto were held on trust for the children or remoter issue of the marriage as Doris should by deed or will appoint and in default of appointment equally for the children of the marriage as therein stated. There was a power to Doris (inter alia) to appoint in favour of an after-taken husband, and this power was exercised to the extent of a one-fourth part of the income of the fund in favour of the second husband of Doris who is the first defendant in the action. It was provided that the settlement of all rights taken thereunder should be determined according to the law of England, and there is no question in the present appeal that the problem that is now presented to the court has to be solved by reference exclusively to English law.

The plaintiffs are the trustees of the settlement. The second, third and fourth defendants are the three children (all daughters) of the first marriage of Doris. Mr. Pozot, her first husband, died in July, 1927, and in the following year Doris married the first defendant to the action, M. Fernand Louis Guerbois. She herself died on June 6, 1941. After her death, the first defendant, her widower, proceeded to go through a form of marriage with the second defendant, one of the three children of Doris and, therefore, one of his own step-daughters. The remaining five defendants (all being infants) are the issue of the first and second defendants. One was, in fact, born during the subsistence of the marriage between the first defendant and Doris, and another was born after the death of Doris, but before the ceremony of marriage between his parents. At all material times Doris and all her three daughters were resident in the south of France, and during the second world war were subject to the government associated with the name of the late Marshal Petain. By a decree promulgated by the marshal or by his authority, the marriage of the first defendant to his step-daughter was declared valid by the law of France, and the decree also legitimated those two of the infant defendants who were born before the marriage of the first and second defendants. After hearing evidence, VAISEY, J., held that for all the purposes of the settlement and the appointment made thereunder, the five infant defendants must be treated as lawful issue of the second defendant, and there is no appeal against that finding. The other two children of Doris by her first marriage, viz., the third and fourth defendants, have married since the proceedings were started, but there is no issue, as yet, of these children and there was no issue of the marriage of Doris and the first defendant.

The power of appointment conferred on Doris by the settlement of 1910 was exercised by her by an English will dated Feb. 16, 1937. After making the provision above-mentioned for the first defendant, her second husband, the will provided as follows:

"As to one equal third share of the said trust funds and of the said other and future acquired property the said trustees or trustee shall pay the income of the said one equal third share to my said daughter Georgette Alphonsine Marguerite Pozot [the third defendant] during her life unless some act or event shall have been done or happened during my life whereby if the same income belonged absolutely to her such income or some part thereof would at my death be or become vested in or charged in favour of some [other] person or until some act or event shall be done or happen within twenty-one years after my death whereby if the same income belonged absolutely to her such income or some part thereof would have become so vested or charged and after the failure or determination during the life of the said Georgette Alphonsine Marguerite Pozot of the trust hereinbefore declared of the said income in her favour the said trustees or trustee shall during the remainder of her life hold the said income upon the trusts and for the purposes upon and for which the same could for the time being be held if she were then dead. And from and after the death of my said daughter the said trustees or trustee shall stand possessed of the capital and income of the said one equal third share in trust for the children or child of my said daughter Georgette Alphonsine Marguerite Pozot . . ."

in manner therein provided. The will then proceeded to deal with the other two third shares of the trust funds, under corresponding trusts, substituting for the name of Georgette the name of one of the other two daughters of Doris.

There was a final disposition in the appointment expressed to take effect in the event of the "failure" of the trusts of any one-third share, on which provision the second question to which I have earlier alluded turns. As a result of the order made by VAISEY, J., the present position is that the income of the entire trust fund is now payable to or for the benefit of the five infant children of the second defendant (who, by the Official Solicitor, are respondents to the appeal), and no part of such income is payable to either of them, the third or fourth defendants (who are the appellants in this court), but the interest of the five infant defendants is liable to be reduced on the birth of further children to the second defendant and also on the coming into existence of children of the third or fourth defendants respectively.

I have stated that Doris and her three children were at all material times resident in what was known as unoccupied France during the late war and so all of them became "enemies" within the meaning of the trading with the enemy legislation at all material times, including the time of the death of Doris on June 6, 1941. The first question, as I have already indicated, is whether the effect of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and the orders made thereunder was, on the death of Doris, to cause an immediate forfeiture of the limited interest given to each of her daughters by the appointment made by Doris by her will, on the ground that in each case the income appointed (if belonging absolutely to such daughter) would have become "vested in, or charged in favour of some person"? It is clear that the words "some person" must mean some person other than the named daughter and that the Custodian of Enemy Property appointed pursuant to the trading with the enemy legislation was and is such a person. It is clear also that nothing turns on the alternative words "or charged in favour of". The matter, as the arguments have proceeded, turns on the proper interpretation of the earlier words "vested in".

One other matter I can dispose of briefly and at once. The relevant appointment consists, as will be remembered, of two parts. The first one-third of income given to Georgette is given to Georgette "unless some act or event shall have . . . happened during my life whereby", etc., or, alternatively, is given to her "until some act or event shall be done or happen within twenty-one years after my death whereby", etc. Counsel for the infant defendants has said that, if the facts are such as do not bring the case within the first limb of the provision to which I have alluded, then at any rate a forfeiture is brought about by the second. I cannot agree that the second part has any application in any circumstances in the present case. It seems to me tolerably clear that the Trading with the Enemy (Specified Areas) Order, 1940, which made the Act apply as regards unoccupied France, was an "act or event" which happened during the life of Doris such as would, at Doris's death, cause the rest of this part of the clause to operate if the word "vested" is satisfied by the effect of the trading with the enemy legislation in other respects. If, however, this part of the clause did not take effect because there would have been no "vesting" within the meaning of the will, then, in my opinion, there is no question that the second alternative part of the clause is also ineffective. In my judgment, nothing that happened after Doris's death can in any circumstances be regarded as an "act or event" within the meaning of the words used.

The whole question, then, turns on the significance of the two words "vested in". In approaching this problem, I agree with counsel for the infant defendants that it is not legitimate to give words in this will a strained construction in order to avoid a particular result on the ground that the particular problem which has arisen was not envisaged by Doris at the time when she made her will. On the other hand, it is nevertheless legitimate to bear in mind that forfeiture clauses are given a strict construction by this court. In the recent case of Re Westby's Settlement (2), in delivering the leading judgment, I referred ([1950] 1 All E.R. 483) to the proposition which I have mentioned and used this language, which I hope I shall be forgiven for quoting, in reference to a decision of FARWELL, J., in Re Greenwood (3):

“ ‘First of all, we must bear in mind that the courts do not construe gifts on forfeitures so as to extend their limits beyond the fair meaning of the words unless they are actually driven to it. Forfeitures are not regarded with favour, and there can be no particular desire to extend the terms of a forfeiture clause to a gift such as the present.’ ”

I think, therefore, as a premise to what follows, that it is necessary to give to this clause not an unnatural or strained construction but a strict one, bearing in mind that the language used is the technical language of lawyers or equity draftsmen who are employed in drawing wills or appointments of this character. Certainly the word “vested” to such persons may be regarded as a term of art, and it has as such, in my judgment, undoubtedly the significance of a passing of some proprietary interest.

I referred during the argument to the definition in STROUD'S JUDICIAL DICTIONARY, 2nd ed., p. 2181, and to the passage cited from Coverdale v. Charlton (4). The relevant passage is:

“ ‘To “vest” generally means, to give the property in’ (per BRETT, L.J., Coverdale v. Charlton (4) 48 L.J.Q.B. 132). ‘It may be useful to refer to the history of the word “vest”, as it is a word which has acquired a definite meaning, carrying with it definite legal consequences’.”

Then there are references to its use in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Trustee Act, 1850, and the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

In Fraenkel v. Whitty (1), which is, substantially, the case now under appeal, ROXBURGH, J., who had to construe a deed of covenant which contained language directed to a forfeiture substantially identical with the words which are contained in Doris's will, came to the conclusion to which he did because he thought that the effect of the trading with the enemy legislation was to produce a result, if not in strict parlance a vesting as understood by lawyers, at least having a practical result equivalent to a vesting. In my judgment, that was not a legitimate way to construe such a clause as this. The words in this will are “or become vested in”, not “or so held as to be in effect vested in” or other words of similar wide and general import.

I must now, however, turn to the Trading with the Enemy Act and the orders made thereunder, so that I can make clear the reasons for my conclusion. The Act of 1939, by s. 7 (1), provides:

“With a view to preventing the payment of money to enemies and of preserving enemy property in contemplation of arrangements to be made at the conclusion of peace, the Board of Trade may appoint custodians of enemy property for England, Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively, and may by order—(a) require the payment to the prescribed custodian of money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be payable to or for the benefit of a person who is an enemy . . . (d) confer and impose on the custodians and on any other person such rights, powers, duties and liabilities as may be prescribed as respects—(i) property which has been, or is required to be, vested in a custodian by or under the order, (ii) property of which the right of transfer has been, or is required to be, so vested, (iii) any other enemy property which has not been, and is not required to be, so vested, or (iv) money which has been, or is by the order required to be, paid to a custodian . . . ”

Paragraph (e) covers the requirement of payment of fees. In sub-s. (4) it is provided that “any order under this section shall have effect notwithstanding anything in any Act passed before this Act.”

Section 4, to which counsel for the third and fourth defendants attached some importance, relates to negotiable instruments and choses in action belonging to enemies, and provides (briefly) that no assignment of a chose in action given by or on behalf of an enemy shall, except with the sanction of the Treasury, be effective so as to confer on that person any rights or remedies or interest whatever.

From what I have read, this much, I venture to think, is quite clear—that there is in this Act the clearest distinction between vesting, on the one hand, and payment of money, on the other, and it is to be noted that this Act differs in this respect from the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, passed on the occasion of the first world war. Under the latter Act vesting orders were made, and had to be made, by the court. Under this Act it is provided that the Board of Trade may, indifferently, make vesting orders and orders requiring payment. But for present purposes the essential matter is the clear distinction which I think is to be found in the language of Parliament between vesting, on the one hand, and payment, on the other. By “vesting”, in such a context, I have no doubt that Parliament was signifying an operation which would pass to the Custodian a proprietary interest in the subject-matter vested, and the significance of s. 4 (I do not desire to make too much of it, as, indeed, counsel did not desire to make too much of it) is that it seems to indicate that, notwithstanding that there may have been orders for payment, under the sanction of the Treasury the assignment of a chose in action is contemplated, and there could, of course, be no assignment of anything unless the assignor had in him something to assign. It is, perhaps, merely an emphasis on the distinction which I think is clear in the Act between vesting and payment.

The Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939, art. 1 (i), is a general direction in exercise of the Board of Trade's power under s. 7 of the Act of 1939:

“Any money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be payable to or for the benefit of a person who is an enemy, and any money which is to be deemed for the purposes of the Act to be money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be so payable, shall be paid to the Custodian.”

Paragraph (ii) descends to the particular and expands what para. (i) has provided:

“Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing paragraph, there shall be paid to the Custodian in particular any money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be payable to or for the benefit of a person who is an enemy, by way of . . . (i) payment arising under any trust, will or settlement.”

There is no doubt that that provision would cover, on the face of it, money arising under the settlement contained in the deed of 1910 and the appointment of 1937. Paragraph (iv) has a significance in the argument, and it provides:

“Any money required to be paid under the foregoing paragraphs of this article to the Custodian, shall be paid . . . (c) in any other case, within fourteen days after the day on which the money becomes payable or would, but for the existence of a state of war, become payable.”

Pausing there, the effect is (as I follow it) that where, under the terms of a trust, the trustees have in hand at any particular point of time money which, by the terms of the trust, becomes then payable by the trustees to the beneficiary, if that beneficiary is an enemy the money has to be paid to the Custodian, not immediately, but within fourteen days after the date which I have mentioned. By art. 2 of the order the Board of Trade is given power, in any case where it appears to them to be expedient so to do, to make a vesting order as regards the enemy property therein mentioned. I need not for the present refer to any more of the original order except art. 7, which provides (as amended by the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) (No. 2) Order, 1942 (S.R. & O., 1942, No. 342)):

"There shall be retained by the Custodian fees equal to two per centum of (a) the amount of moneys paid to him, and (b) the value of any property which is vested in him or of which the right of transfer is vested in him."

Again, as I think, the clearest distinction is drawn throughout that order between vesting, on the one hand, and payment, on the other. The order is made, as its introductory paragraph states, under s. 7 of the Act of 1939, and, following the dichotomy between vesting and payment, it may, I think, be safely asserted that the provisions of art. 1 (ii), which particularly relates to the question of money, are made under the terms of s. 7 (1) (a) as being orders requiring payment, whereas the powers contemplated by art. 2 of the order, if exercised, would be made under s. 7 (1) (b) or (c). Furthermore, I think that if and so far as the order requires third parties (in this case, say, Westminster Bank, Ltd.) to pay over moneys to the Custodian, that obligation is imposed on Westminster Bank, Ltd., by s. 7 (1) (d) (iii). The distinction is, I think, further emphasised by another important addition to the original order, viz., that now contained in art. 1 (vii) as a result of the addition made by the amending order, the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) (Amendment) Order, 1941 (S.R. & O., 1941, No. 765), which adds to art. 1, among other things,

"(vii) The Custodian shall have power to sue for and recover any moneys payable to him under this order."

That relates, therefore, to moneys which the order states are payable to the Custodian, and it was thought proper—indeed necessary—to confer specially on the Custodian a statutory power to sue for and recover such money. If and so far as there had been a vesting in the Custodian of the subject-matter out of which the payments arose, no special statutory power to sue would, I conceive, have been necessary.

I hope that, having regard to the importance of the matter, I shall not be thought to be taking too much time on this problem, but in the course of the discussion before ROXBURGH, J., much of the argument (according to the judgment) was directed, first, to the proper effect of the interpretation to be given to the formula "money which would be payable to a person who is an enemy", and, secondly, to the precise effect of this fourteen days' interval which is given between the day when the trustees have, under the terms of their trust, money in hand and payable to a beneficiary, and the time when they become liable to be sued by the Custodian. As regards the first matter, I have no doubt, for myself (and I do not think learned counsel disagreed about it) that the use of the present tense in the phrase "a person" who is an "enemy" in art. 1 (i) and art. 1 (ii), is a reference to the point of time when, to take the case of a trust, the money has become, in the hands of the trustees, payable to that (enemy) beneficiary.

It appears, then, in the case of money, with which we are concerned here, the phrase has this result, that when any money which, under the terms of the settlement and the appointment, would be payable to a person who was, at the date when, under the terms of the trust, it became so payable, an enemy, then a period of fourteen days is, nevertheless, allowed under this order (for obvious administrative reasons) which the payer, the trustee, has before he becomes under the final obligation liable to be sued accordingly to pay over to the Custodian.

A question was raised of what would happen if, after the date when, under the terms of a trust, a sum of money representing a particular piece of income became payable to the beneficiary (being then an enemy), but before the expiration of the fourteen days, or, at any rate, before the time when the money had in fact been handed over, the beneficiary eluded the occupying forces of the enemy and arrived in England, being an Englishman, or not an enemy national, and claimed to have payment made to himself or herself. It seems to me that the answer to that problem, under the terms of this order, is (and what I am now stating agrees with the conclusion of ROXBURGH, J.) that once the money has become, according to the terms of the trust, payable to a person who is at that point of time an enemy, then it is payable to the Custodian, and the return to these shores of the beneficiary before actual payment would not have the effect of depriving the Custodian of his right to recover that particular item of money. I think that is reinforced by the circumstance that under the terms of art. 3 (iv) of this order it is also provided that the Custodian is entitled to give a good discharge for any sums paid to him pursuant to the order. On the other hand, if the operation were one of vesting during such period as the beneficiary was an enemy, so far as I can see the arrival in this country, before actual payment, of the beneficiary, thereby disembarassing himself or herself from his or her enemy quality, would cause an immediate re-vesting and would then put an end to the right of the Custodian. However, it is, perhaps, at this stage significant to note that, according to the evidence, a material fact in this case is that none of the moneys in question has been handed over to the Custodian, but the Westminster Bank, Ltd., now has certain sums of money in its possession, and has never been, in fact, called on to pay over those moneys to the Custodian. It seems to me that it would be very difficult to say that in the hands of the Westminster Bank any such moneys were "vested" in law in the Custodian. The Custodian may or may not have the right to call on the bank to pay over some or all of the money in the bank's hands. If he has, it is, to my mind, a right dependent on a particular statutory right given to him and not on a proprietary title. I should also add that in point of fact no fees have been charged in respect of this income by the Custodian, so that no question arises of the effect (whatever it might be) of the liability of the income for the provision of such fees.

We were referred to Re Münster (5) and Re Gourju's Will Trusts (6), cases which came before RUSSELL, J., and SIMONDS, J., respectively, the first being under the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, and the second under the existing Act. The effect of those cases, undoubtedly, is that moneys actually in the hands of the Custodian are treated as held on "statutory suspense": no beneficial interest in them can be asserted by anybody. Certainly, the Custodian cannot be regarded as holding such moneys as trustee or agent for the original enemy beneficiary. That is true, and in that respect I conceive that there is no distinction between the two Acts. It is, no doubt, true also that any money which has in fact been paid to the Custodian and is in his hands may properly be said, according to the ordinary use of language, to be then "vested" in the Custodian—and not vested in him on behalf, as I have said, of the original beneficiary. But the ability so to assert does not, I think, advance the case of the infant defendants.

In considering the construction of the will here in suit the essential formula "income or some part thereof would be or become vested in" must relate in the context to the life interests given, and, therefore, mean that "the right to receive the income would be or become vested", etc., at the death of Doris. At the moment of Doris's death the income in question was not an existing entity in the same sense as a fund of a corpus to which the formula also applies. It is, therefore, this life interest, this right to receive the income of which, if counsel for the infant defendants is right, it must be shown that it vested, or would have been apart from the forfeiture provision, vested in the Custodian as a result of the trading with the enemy legislation to which I have made reference. By the effect of that legislation the Custodian, as I have said, had the right to demand payment to him of that income as it fell due, but he surely had that right, not because some proprietary interest under the settlement from which the income sprang was vested in him, but, on the contrary, because the proprietary interest, the life estate, was vested, not in him, but in an enemy under the legislation, viz., Georgette.

I think, therefore, that there was no such proprietary interest under the trust fund or its income which, by the terms of this legislation, vested in the Custodian. Counsel for the infant defendants argued that where a third party (in this case the Custodian) has a right to receive some part of the income as it accrues under a settlement and to receive and hold it not merely as a trustee or agent for the beneficiary under the settlement, then there is a vesting. That, I think, with all respect to counsel, is an over-simplification of the matter and disregards the fundamental distinction that I have tried to state by the language I have used, that the Custodian's right to receive the income depends essentially on the circumstance that a proprietary interest in the investments is not vested in him but in "an enemy" within the meaning of the legislation. The difference and distinction, I doubt not, is a somewhat narrow one, but I think or hope, at any rate, that it is clear and sensible to a lawyer.

During the case I have drawn attention, by way of illustrating the distinction, to the point arising from what I call the fourteen days' interval in art. 1 (iv) (c) of the main order, and I have also drawn attention to the addition to the order of the right to the Custodian to sue, given in the case where the order requires payment to him of particular moneys, and not, of course, and properly not, directed to the case where the proprietary interest from which the money springs is vested in the Custodian. In the course of our discussions JENKINS, L.J., further illustrated the distinction thus. Suppose, in reference to one of the investments held by the trustees of the settlement, there was a bonus issue of shares distributable, according to the terms of the settlement, to the tenant for life. It is, I suggest, manifest that, under the terms of this order as it stands, the Custodian would have no claim whatever to those shares, for they are not "money" and they are not covered by the direction for payment. If, on the other hand, there had been a vesting in the Custodian of the proprietary interest from which such a bonus issue sprang, then, of course, the Custodian would be entitled to the shares as the fruit of the subject-matter vested in him. Recent legislation has after all made us familiar with the distinction, which might have been obscure to our ancestors, between the position of those who are given statutory rights, having no proprietary interest, and those who have proprietary interests conferring privileges which are for practical purposes no different from the statutory rights. I quoted during the course of the argument the instance of the Minister who requisitions property. He has, in respect of the property so requisitioned, for all practical purposes all the advantages and privileges of a tenant—the right to possess and the right to exclude others from possession—but he has no estate or interest in the property whatever and cannot, therefore, confer any estate or interest on any other person. The same may be said to be the situation of the phenomenon of this age commonly known as the statutory tenant.

I turn, therefore, finally to the judgment of ROXBURGH, J., in Fraenkel v. Whitty (1). That was a case in which the forfeiture clause arose under a deed of covenant, but, as I have said, the language was not in any material respect dissimilar from the present. In particular, though it comprehended the two alternatives "vested in or charged in favour of", it did not, as the present case does not, include the other words, so frequently seen in covenants of this kind, "or payable to"; but, as I have already said, the learned judge came to the conclusion that a forfeiture was incurred because, under the terms of the order I have read, if the particular annual sums had belonged absolutely to the recipient they would have vested in the Custodian in the sense that they would have been held so as to be payable to him in a sense which made it in all respects the same thing as though they were vested. I do not think that in so stating I am doing injustice to the judgment. ROXBURGH, J., said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 648):

"Accordingly, the event which happened would have caused the June instalment to be payable to the Custodian within fourteen days of its due date, and, if not paid, would have rendered the settlor liable to a penalty. It would have vested in the Custodian the right to sue for it and to give a good discharge for it. It would have put him in a position as strong as, or, indeed, stronger than, that of a legal assignee. It is difficult to see what more could have been done to 'vest' that instalment in him, short of actual payment, and the context shows that in the deed 'vest' cannot refer to actual payment. No vesting order under the Act could have given the Custodian more than he got. In my judgment, the word 'vest' in this deed is used to indicate just such a situation as the Act would have brought into being in relation to the June instalment, and there would have been a vesting of it in the Custodian."

With all respect to the learned judge, I am unable to accept that reasoning. I do not think it true that the event which happened would have vested in the Custodian, within the meaning of the deed in question, the right to sue for it. It would have had that effect only in the sense that under the terms of the order the Custodian had a statutory right to sue if not paid, but I do not think that there is such a vesting as is comprehended by the proper use of that word, and, although I do not at all dissent from the view that for practical purposes the Custodian may have been in as good a position as if there had been a vesting, that does not seem to me to involve the conclusion that there was a vesting.

The learned judge then says (ibid.):

"In reaching this conclusion, I have assumed that the phrase 'would be payable', when used in art. 1 (i) of the order, means 'would be payable at the date of the order or would thereafter become payable', and that, once money has become payable, its character is fixed, and it must be paid to the Custodian, whatever may be the subsequent history of the person to whom it became payable."

There is then a long paragraph in which he proceeds to deal with what he states to have been the argument of Mr. Danckwerts for the view now put forward by counsel for the third and fourth defendants. I confess that I have felt considerable difficulty in comprehending this paragraph. To Mr. Danckwerts is attributed an argument, as a premise to his whole case, which required the construction of the simpler words "would be payable" in s. 7 (1) (a) of the Act of 1939 as meaning

"would be payable at the date of the order or would thereafter become payable and would continue to be payable", so as to produce the result (contrary to what, I think, is the true result) that if, before actual payment under the terms of art. 1 of the order of 1939, an enemy beneficiary returned to this country disembarassed of his or her enemy character, the right of the Custodian to require payment would come to an end. I do not think that is a right conclusion, and if and so far as Mr. Danckwerts made it the basis of the argument against that which commended itself to ROXBURGH, J., I agree with ROXBURGH, J., in his rejection of it. I cannot, indeed, avoid altogether the suspicion that, if such was the argument put forward, the learned judge may well have been influenced strongly towards the conclusion that he reached by the fallacy in the argument that he described as the alternative. My difficulties are increased by the circumstance that the law reporters, in stating what Mr. Danckwerts' argument, in fact, was, do not attribute to him the unfortunate and (as I think) erroneous premise which, in the judgment it appears ROXBURGH, J., thought had been the foundation of his case.

Whatever may be the solution of the particular problem, however, I have, for the reasons which I have attempted to state, felt compelled to differ in this matter from ROXBURGH, J., and I am bound to say that I think his conclusion in Fraenkel v. Whitty (1) was incorrect. The result in the present case is that the foundation of VAISEY, J.'s conclusion is gone, and I think that the appeal on this first question should succeed. In other words, I think that the question answered affirmatively by VAISEY, J., should have been answered negatively, and the result is that the other question raised in the appeal no longer arises. We have considered whether, in the circumstances, we ought to express our view on it, but, as it appears to turn almost entirely on the construction of this particular document, it does not seem to us necessary to pursue that matter, and, therefore, I do not propose to say anything about it. In my judgment, on the first point the appeal succeeds and the order made below should be reversed accordingly.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree, but as we are differing from ROXBURGH, J., and from VAISEY, J., who followed ROXBURGH, J., on a point of some difficulty and importance, I may, perhaps, be excused for adding a few observations of my own. The question in the case is whether the complex of events comprising the outbreak of war between this country and Germany, the passing of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, the making of the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939, the invasion of France by the German forces and the consequent making of the Trading with the Enemy (Specified Areas) Order, 1940, on July 10, 1940, the making of the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) (Amendment) Order, 1941, on May 30, 1941 (all of which events happened in the lifetime of the settlor), coupled with the residence of the three income beneficiaries in France, amounted, within the meaning of the appointment, to an act or event done or happening during the life of the settlor whereby, if the income had belonged absolutely to the income beneficiaries, such income would, at the settlor's death, be or become vested in or charged in favour of "some (scilicet, other) person". That, I think, is the question, for I agree with my Lord that if the events here under consideration cannot be shown to have brought about a determination of the life interest under the first branch of the provision for determination contained in the appointment, it is reasonably plain that no forfeiture can have been brought about by any act or event done or happening within the scope of the second branch.

The question raises, in effect, two points: first, what is the true construction of the provision for determination contained in the appointment, and, secondly, was the effect of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and of the orders made thereunder on the property in this country of technical enemies, as, for example, the income beneficiaries under this settlement, such as to bring about a forfeiture, having regard to the true construction of the forfeiture provision?

I propose to address myself first to the question of construction. The words are "unless some act or event shall have been done or happened during my life [the life of the settlor] whereby if the same income belonged absolutely to her [the income beneficiary] such income or some part thereof would at my death be or become vested in or charged in favour of some [other] person."

Clauses of this general description have a fairly long history, and any conveyancer will have seen them in many settlements in a large variety of forms. What may, perhaps, be termed the rudimentary form is a gift to the income beneficiary "until he shall assign or charge or attempt to assign or charge the income or any part thereof". A clause in that form, from the point of view of complete protection, is obviously imperfect, for it would not apply to events in which the income beneficiary played a purely passive role (as, for instance, the event of bankruptcy), and an improvement or enlargement of the clause, as regards the circumstances bringing about the events sought to be guarded against, is sometimes met with in the form of a trust to pay the income to the beneficiary "until any act or event shall be done or suffered by" the beneficiary whereby the result to be prevented would be brought about. That includes the case where the beneficiary plays a passive role. A yet wider form may be framed (as in this case) so as to depend merely on the doing or happening of some act or event without any qualifying words to indicate who the actor is to be or to suggest at all events permission on the part of the beneficiary. That considerably enlarges the scope of the clause. As to the events which are to occasion forfeiture, as distinct from the circumstances bringing them about, the clause may be framed so as to create a gift over, as already instanced, in the case of an assigning or charging, or attempted assigning or charging. That may not cover all events. I mentioned the possible circumstance of bankruptcy, where, although there is a vesting in the trustee, there may have been nothing amounting to an assignment in his favour. Such events as that are covered, or may be covered, by the use of the word "vested", sometimes in addition to, and sometimes in substitution for, the reference to an assignment or charge. For instance, a common variant is the form used here:

"until some act or event shall be done or happen whereby the income, if belonging absolutely to the beneficiary, would be or become vested in or charged in favour of some other person."

Lest that should not suffice to cover all events, recourse is sometimes had to a wider form, the form "be or become vested in or charged in favour of or payable to some other person". Lastly, I would refer to, perhaps, the widest form of all, the compendious form used in the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 33, where the interest of the principal beneficiary is made to endure until any event happens whereby if the income belonged absolutely to him he would be deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof.

Each of these forms has its own scope, and when the question arises whether a forfeiture has occurred under a particular settlement it is necessary to look critically at the language of the particular clause and see whether, having regard to the language of that clause and the nature of the event relied on as bringing about a forfeiture, a forfeiture has been incurred. The words here, as I have said, are "be or become vested or charged in favour of some (scilicet, other) person". It has not been contended before us, nor do I think it could be contended with any reasonable prospect of success, that there has been any charge in this case. The argument is centred on the question whether there has been a vesting of the income or some part thereof in some other person. Now, "vesting" is to some extent, I think, a term of art, and, to my mind, and, I should say, to the minds of most lawyers, it would connote a vesting in point of interest—a transfer of the property, or the passing of a proprietary interest of some sort, to the person in whose favour the vesting is said to take effect. Thus, in my view, the event here contemplated by the words "become vested in some person" is an event amounting to a transfer of the ownership of, or of a proprietary interest in, the income or in some part thereof to some other person. It follows, in my judgment, that no forfeiture was here incurred unless the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and the orders made thereunder, fairly considered, and with their legal consequences properly taken into account, would, apart from the forfeiture provision, have brought about something amounting to a vesting in the Custodian of the income or some part thereof, in the sense of a transfer to the Custodian of a proprietary interest therein.

The argument of counsel for the infant defendants took this form. He said the income beneficiary was entitled to the income of a share of the fund during her life. What did that mean? It meant simply that she had the right to receive the income of the share during her life. The effect of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and the relevant orders, apart from the forfeiture provision, would have been to give the Custodian the right to receive that income as and when it accrued, so long as the beneficiary continued to be a technical enemy. Therefore, said counsel, the right to receive the income during that period would have become vested in the Custodian. Therefore, the income would have become vested in the Custodian within the meaning of the forfeiture provision in the appointment. With all respect to counsel, that is, to my mind, an over-simplification. Each of these income beneficiaries had a life interest in a share of the fund. That means, no doubt, a right to the income of that share of the fund during her life. That is an interest well known in equity, and I would describe each of them as the beneficial owner for life of one-third of the fund, and, consequently, a beneficial owner for life of the income accruing and to accrue from the fund. That is the nature of their interest. No doubt, as an owner of such equitable interest each of the income beneficiaries had the right to receive her share of income, and, no doubt, the right to receive the share of income is the most important incident of ownership, but while the owner of an interest in income has a right to receive the income it does not follow that anyone else who, by whatever means and for whatever purpose, is given a right to receive that same income, becomes the owner. The person who is given the right to receive the income may or may not become the owner, but it does not follow that he is the owner because he has the right to receive the income.

My view being, therefore, that "vested in some person" means "vested in point of proprietary interest in some person," it remains to consider the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act and orders to see whether (apart from the forfeiture clause) the operation of those provisions was such as to give the Custodian in this case a proprietary interest in the income of these three beneficiaries under the settlement or in some part thereof. I will not traverse again at length the ground already covered by my Lord. The Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, provides by s. 4 (1):

"No assignment of a chose in action made by or on behalf of an enemy shall, except with the sanction of the Treasury, be effective so as to confer on any person any rights or remedies in respect of the chose in action; and neither a transfer of a negotiable instrument by or on behalf of an enemy, nor any subsequent transfer thereof, shall, except with the sanction of the Treasury, be effective so as to confer any rights or remedies against any party to the instrument."

I cite that provision as a provision to be borne in mind in considering the Trading with the Enemy Orders as showing that, so far as the Act is concerned, it does appear to recognise something in the nature of a proprietary interest remaining in an enemy and capable of being assigned by an enemy, for it is only on that footing that it was necessary to enact by s. 4 (1) that an assignment should not be valid except with the sanction of the Treasury. The only other section of the Act to which I need refer is s. 7, to which my Lord has already made reference. Its provisions are enabling in character, and the relevant operative provisions, in substance, are to be found in the orders made under those enabling provisions. Turning to the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939, one finds there, as in the Act itself, a clear distinction between two possible courses. The orders contemplated by s. 7 may, on the one hand, require the payment to the prescribed Custodian of money which would, but for the existence of the state of war, be payable to or for the benefit of (to put it shortly) an enemy, as one possible course, or may, on the other hand, vest in the prescribed Custodian such enemy property as may be prescribed. Those are two alternative courses, and I think the fact that they are expressed in that way indicates that the legislature contemplated that an order might require payment of money to the Custodian without thereby vesting any proprietary interest in the money in the Custodian, and that where it was necessary or expedient that the Custodian should be invested with proprietary rights, then that could be done by means of a vesting order.

That distinction is preserved in the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939. The first observation I would make about that order is that so far as money is concerned it does not use the expressions one would expect to find in an order transferring a proprietary interest in given sums of money to the Custodian. Article 1 (i) deals with and it does not provide that such money is to belong to or vest in the Custodian. It enacts that such money “shall be paid to the Custodian”. So far, then, what seems to me to be done is that the Custodian is given no proprietary interest, but where there is money due and payable to a person who, at the time when the money is due and payable, is an enemy, then the person from whom the money is due is placed under a statutory obligation to pay the money to the Custodian. That state of affairs seems to me to be perfectly consistent with the absence of any proprietary interest in the Custodian. Article 1 (ii) goes on to detail the sources from which the money in question may come and includes “payment arising under any trust, will or settlement”. The effect is that (apart from the forfeiture provision) the Westminster Bank, as trustee of the settlement, whenever it became possessed of any income arising from the trust fund in the form of money, fell under a statutory obligation to pay that money to the Custodian, provided that at the date when it came to hand and was thus immediately divisible among the income beneficiaries, each of the income beneficiaries was still technically an enemy. Again, I think there is nothing in that which postulates any proprietary interest in the Custodian: it is a statutory obligation on the trustees when they have money in hand owing to an enemy beneficiary to pay that money to the Custodian and not to the beneficiary—not because it is money of the Custodian, but because it is money of the beneficiary. It is recognised that the title remains in the beneficiary, and it is because the title is in the beneficiary and the beneficiary is an enemy that the statutory obligation to pay the Custodian is imposed.

“Any money which would, but for the existence of a state of war, be payable to or for the benefit of a person who is an enemy . . .”,

When any money has been paid to the Custodian it is true that he has to hold it, under art. 3 of the order, in suspense. He has to hold it, along with any property vested in him under the provisions of any vesting order,

“until the termination of the present war, and shall thereafter deal with the same in such manner as the Board of Trade shall direct.”

He holds the money he receives, and he holds it in suspense in accordance with that provision. But I do not think it follows from the fact that he so holds any money representing income of a trust fund as and when he receives it from the trustees of a settlement, that there has been any vesting in him of the proprietary interest in the income of the trust fund of a beneficiary under the settlement who is an enemy. Furthermore, as my Lord has pointed out, in this case there was never, in fact, any payment at all to the Custodian of any of the income. It was, through inadvertence, as it was put in the affidavit in support of the summons, simply held by the bank and, I think, invested. Considering the matter as if the life interests had been given free of any provision for forfeiture, I think the result follows that the income in question, never having in fact been paid to the Custodian, never became subject to the provisions of art. 3 of the order. It may be that the bank committed a statutory offence in failing to pay this income over, and it may be that the Custodian could have sued the bank and demanded the money, but unless and until the money was in fact paid over to the Custodian, so far as I can see it remained throughout nothing more nor less than income due to beneficiaries who were enemies during the material period and, as such, income which the bank was under a statutory obligation (which it did not perform) to pay over to the Custodian.

I can find no warrant in the order for holding that the Custodian had any proprietary interest in this income. Accordingly, in my view, after giving the best consideration I can to the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and the orders made thereunder, and applying what I conceive to be the true construction of the forfeiture clause, I cannot find that the relevant event has happened on the happening of which the forfeiture was to take effect. I have not overlooked the fact that, by the amending order of 1941, the Custodian was given power to sue for and recover any moneys payable to him under the order. Nor have I overlooked the fact that under art. 3 (iv) of the order of 1939 the receipt of the Custodian for any money paid to him under the order was to be a good discharge. Notwithstanding these two provisions and notwithstanding the statutory obligation to pay money to the Custodian in the circumstances I have mentioned, it does not seem to me that the Custodian's powers, rights and duties, important as they were, and though, taken together, they might put him in a position approximating to that of an owner, were such as to confer on him any proprietary right. I think his position fell short of that of a person in whom the income under this settlement or some part thereof would, apart from the forfeiture provision, have been "vested" within the meaning of the appointment.

The decision to which, in my view, we should come is, I should emphasise, a decision which turns on the true construction of this particular forfeiture clause. There may well be clauses so worded that the effect of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and the orders made thereunder was to bring about a forfeiture. Examples of that are to be found in the books. There is a case to which my Lord has referred, Re Gourju's Will Trusts (6). In that case the settlement adopted the protective trusts defined by the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 33, so that forfeiture was to ensue when any event happened whereby, if the said income were payable during the trust period to the principal beneficiary absolutely, during that period he would be deprived of the right to receive the same or any part thereof. In the face of that language, SIMONDS, J., held that the effect of the Trading with the Enemy Act and orders was to bring about a forfeiture because the effect of them was quite plainly to deprive the principal beneficiary of the right to receive the income. But there are no such words in this appointment.

Again, UTHWATT, J., in Re Hall (7) had to consider the case of an annuity bequeathed to an annuitant with a provision for forfeiture if she should alienate or charge the annuity or do or suffer any act whereby it might become vested in or payable to any other person. The learned judge held, and I find difficulty in seeing how he could have held otherwise, that, having regard to the fact that the annuitant was living in France, the effect of the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, was that the annuity, if not forfeited, would become payable to the Custodian of Enemy Property; and prima facie that meant, I think, that, as the annuity would have become payable to the Custodian of Enemy Property but for the forfeiture clause, the forfeiture clause, containing, as it did, the words "vested in or payable to", would have operated. But the learned judge in that case found himself able to escape that conclusion on the strength of the words "do or suffer any act" and he held that the unfortunate events whereby the annuitant had become a technical enemy were neither acts done by her nor acts suffered by her, placing, in the context, on the word "suffer" the meaning "permit". But in this case the words "or payable" are not present. The words are "vested in", and for the reasons I have given I do not think that the Trading with the Enemy Act and orders would have brought about a "vesting" within the meaning of this forfeiture provision.

I may, perhaps, be excused for referring to Re Sartoris's Estate (8). I refer to it because it provides an illustration of a case in which income may become payable to some person other than the income beneficiary, or some person other than the beneficiary may acquire the right to receive the income, although the income is not vested in that other person. The headnote to the case is:

"A testator bequeathed the income of his residuary estate to his son during his life, or until he should assign or dispose of the income or some part thereof, 'or become bankrupt, or do or suffer something whereby the said income if belonging absolutely to him, or some part thereof, would become payable to or vested in some other person'. In October, 1890, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the son, and in November, 1890, a receiving order was made. A meeting of creditors was held in December and adjourned till January, when it was adjourned again, and nothing further had been done in the matter:—Held (affirming the decision of CHITTY, J.), that though the income did not vest in the official receiver, it would, by force of the receiving order have become payable to him if it had belonged absolutely to the tenant for life, and that the interest of the tenant for life had determined."

CHITTY, J., said ([1892] 1 Ch. 13):

"Now the first point to be ascertained is, the effect of a receiving order under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The material sections are the 9th, which provides that 'on the making of a receiving order, an official receiver shall be thereby constituted receiver of the property of the debtor', and the 70th section, which defines his duties. Sub-section 2 is the more material one, which enacts that for the purpose of his duties as interim receiver, 'the official receiver shall have the same powers as if he were a receiver and manager appointed by the High Court'. Upon the Act of Parliament it is quite clear that the debtor's property does not pass to the receiver; but it is equally clear that it is the duty of the receiver to execute his office, and to receive whatever property the debtor may have. If there is property in the debtor's possession, the receiver intervenes by taking possession for the purposes of protecting the property, and seeing that it reaches its ultimate destination, whatever that may be, according to the result of the bankruptcy proceedings. It being plain that there is no vesting of the debtor's property in the receiver, it follows, and has been decided, that notwithstanding the receiving order the bankrupt alone can bring actions for the recovery of property not in his possession, as for instance a debt due to him at law."

Apart from the circumstances that in the present case the Custodian of Enemy Property was given an express right to sue for money which had become payable to him under the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Orders, it seems to me that those observations provide a reasonably close analogy to the present case. The receiver was under a duty to execute his office and to receive whatever property the debtor might have. Nevertheless, the property did not vest in the receiver. The receiver's duty was to take possession for the purpose of protecting the property and seeing that it reached its ultimate destination, whatever that might be. So, too, it might here be said that the Custodian was under a duty to receive money due to enemies and that persons holding money due to enemies were under a statutory obligation to pay that money to him, and the Custodian was then to hold it in suspense and see that it reached its ultimate destination, whatever that might be, under whatever directions might ultimately, at the conclusion of hostilities, be given by the Board of Trade.

Re Sartoris's Estate (8) is, I think, also instructive in another respect. It will be remembered that the words of forfeiture in that case were "payable to or vested in some other person", and that, for the reasons to which I have referred, CHITTY, J., held that there was no vesting in the receiver. But he drew a sharp distinction between the words "payable to" and "vested in" and held that the income had become payable to the receiver although it had not become vested in him. That, I think, bears out my observations earlier in this judgment as to the difference in effect of different forms of forfeiture clauses. If, here, the words "or payable to" had been present, or if, here, the event of forfeiture had been defined as deprivation of the right to receive the income or some part thereof, the result would, I venture to think, inevitably have been different. But the words we here have to construe are "vested in"; and for the reasons given by my Lord and those which I have added (I am afraid at undue length) I am of opinion that there was here no vesting in the Custodian within the meaning of the appointment.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am in full agreement with the judgments which my Lords have delivered.

Appeal allowed. Declaration accordingly.

Solicitors: Michael Kramer (for the third and fourth defendants); Official Solicitor (for the infant defendants); Caprons & Crosse (for the trustees).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. KENT JUSTICES. Ex parte MACHIN.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Ormerod and Parker, JJ.), April 7, 1952.]

Justices—Indictable offence triable summarily—Need to explain to defendant liability to be committed to quarter sessions for sentence—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (c. 49), s. 17 (2) and Criminal Justice Act, 1925 (c. 86), s. 24 (2), as amended by Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), sched. IX.

The applicant, having consented to be dealt with summarily, was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction of obtaining credit by fraud and of larceny, and he was committed to quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. The court failed to explain to the applicant that he might be so committed, as is required by s. 17 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and s. 24 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, as amended by sched. IX to the Criminal Jurisdiction Act, 1948. On an application for an order of certiorari,

HELD: the provisions of the statutes were peremptory, and, therefore, the convictions were bad because the justices, although with the consent of the applicant, had dealt with the cases summarily without complying with those provisions, and the order for certiorari must go and the convictions be quashed.

R. v. Cockshott ([1898] 1 Q.B. 582), applied.

FOR THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948, s. 29 and sched. IX, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 14, p. 1013 and Vol. 28, p. 409, respectively.

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Cockshott, [1898] 1 Q.B. 582; 67 L.J.Q.B. 467; 78 L.T. 168; 62 J.P. 325; 14 Digest 130, 1032.
- (2) R. v. South Greenhoe JJ. Ex p. Public Prosecutions Director, [1950] 2 All E.R. 42; [1950] 2 K.B. 558; 114 J.P. 312; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) R. v. Middlesex Quarter Sessions. Ex p. Public Prosecutions Director, [1950] 1 All E.R. 916; [1950] 2 K.B. 589; 114 J.P. 276; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) R. v. Grant, [1951] 1 All E.R. 28; [1951] 1 K.B. 500; 115 J.P. 36.

MOTION for certiorari to bring up and quash two convictions of obtaining credit by fraud and larceny by a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Herne Bay, on Aug. 29, 1951.

The applicant was committed by the justices to the East Kent quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. He contended that his convictions were bad in law because the court of summary jurisdiction did not explain to him that he might be so committed, contrary to the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17 (2), and the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 24 (2), as amended by sched. IX to the Criminal Justice Act, 1948.

Jupp for the applicant.

Eddie for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicant, Peter Lawrence Machin, moves for an order for certiorari to bring up and quash two convictions of the applicant by Kent justices sitting in the St. Augustine's division. The applicant was convicted of obtaining credit by fraud on Aug. 21 and 24, 1951, and of the larceny of two fountain pens, and he was committed to quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. Before quarter sessions objection was taken that his convictions were bad, and so they adjourned consideration of the matter to enable it to be argued in this court on an application for an order for certiorari.

By s. 29 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, power is given to justices to commit such a person as the applicant to quarter sessions for sentence. Under s. 17 (1) and (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, a person who is charged before justices with an offence punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding three months, and under s. 24 (1) and (2) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, a person who is charged with an indictable offence which can be dealt with summarily, must be informed of his right to be tried by a jury and must consent to be dealt with summarily, and, further, by the amendments to the sections I have mentioned which are contained in sched. IX to the Act of 1948 it must be explained to him that, if he is convicted by the justices, he may be committed to quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 of the Act of 1948 if the court, on obtaining information as to his character and antecedents, is of opinion that they are such that greater punishment should be inflicted than they (the justices) have power to inflict. In the present case the procedure prescribed by the earlier Acts was followed, but the applicant was not told of his liability to be committed under s. 29.

There is no question of any advantage having been taken of the applicant. The offences charged against him were undoubtedly offences with which the justices could deal with his consent. He was represented by a solicitor who told the justices that he desired to be dealt with by them. Clearly he consented, but the jurisdiction of justices to deal with cases which are prima facie indictable is purely statutory and the provisions of these statutes are peremptory. In 1898 in R. v. Cockshott (1) the prisoner had been charged with an offence to which s. 17 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, applied, and so he was entitled to be told, before he was called on to plead, that he could go for trial if he liked. R. v. Cockshott (1) shows how strictly the court construes such provisions because in that case the solicitor for the prosecution and the solicitor for the defence were both present in court. They talked together and agreed that the case should be dealt with by the justices. Thereupon no one thought it necessary to tell the prisoner of his right to be tried by a jury because he was represented by a solicitor who had agreed to treat the case as a summary case. The court held that the provisions of the statute must be strictly complied with, and, as the prisoner had not been told of his right to be tried by a jury before the trial started, the conviction must be quashed.

Following the reasoning of the court in R. v. Cockshott (1), we think we must give effect to the provisions of sched. IX to the Act of 1948, and we must, therefore, hold that the order for certiorari must go and these convictions must be quashed because the justices took on themselves, although with the consent of the applicant, to try the cases summarily without a strict compliance with all the statutory provisions which now allow an indictable offence to be dealt with summarily. It was a very venial offence in the justices and one can well understand their overlooking a provision tucked away in a schedule as this one is, but the applicant is entitled to take advantage of it, and, therefore, we hold the committal and the convictions to be bad. That distinguishes this case from R. v. South Greenhoe JJ. Ex p. Public Prosecutions (Director) (2). In that case there had been a strict compliance with the section, but, although the justices had power to convict, for reasons I need not go into now, they had no power to commit the defendant for sentence and so the committal was bad and the case was sent back to the justices to complete the hearing.

The applicant, technically, has never been in peril and he could now be tried over again. He has been seven months in custody, and in those circumstances—it must be a matter for the prosecution, for this court has no power to give directions on the matter—we think it would not be right in the interests of justice that further proceedings be taken against him for the two cases in which he has been actually convicted. Whether the prosecution consider it right to proceed in the four cases outstanding, which have never been made the subject of a charge, although the applicant wanted them taken into consideration, is a matter for the prosecution.

ORMEROD, J.: I agree.

PARKER, J.: I agree.

Order for certiorari.

Solicitors: Cunliffe & Airy, agents for H. W. S. Homewood, Canterbury (for the applicant); W. L. Platts, county solicitor, Maidstone (for the Crown).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

WATSON v. BRITISH THOMSON-HOUSTON CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Parker, J.), April 2, 3, 1952.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Circular saw—Riving knife—Arc of “radius not exceeding radius of largest saw used on bench”—Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922 (S.R. & O., 1922, No. 1196), reg. 10 (b) (i).

A circular saw was bought with a twenty-four inch diameter blade, and that blade was replaced when necessary with a new twenty-four inch blade, but with use the diameter of a blade was gradually reduced by the continual sharpening of the tips and re-gulleting (cutting deeper by filing) of the indentations. Owing to market conditions a new blade ordered in February, 1948, was not received until April, 1950, and in consequence, in March, 1950, the diameter of the old blade was only $19\frac{1}{2}$ inches, compared with a diameter of twenty-four inches of the circle of which an arc was formed by the riving knife used to fence it. The distance of the front edge of the riving knife from the teeth of the saw at table bench level was under half an inch in accordance with the requirements of reg. 10 (b) (ii) of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, but, owing to the different diameters, the distance horizontally $4\frac{3}{4}$ inches above the table, where the knife met the guard covering the top of the saw, was $1\frac{1}{8}$ to $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches. While he was removing a piece of wood jammed in the machine, the operator's fingers were caught in the saw and he was injured.

HELD: the expression “the largest saw used on the bench” in reg. 10 (b) (i) of the Woodworking Regulations, 1922, did not mean the largest saw capable of being used, designed to be used, at some time used, or constantly used, but the largest saw which could be said to be used on the bench in the light of all the circumstances, including how often such a saw was used as opposed to any other saw. On the facts the largest saw used was a twenty-four inch saw, and there had thus been no breach of the regulations requiring that the edge of the knife nearer the saw should “form an arc of a circle having a radius not exceeding the radius of the largest saw used on the bench”.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff had been employed for twenty-three years by the defendants as a sawyer, and since 1946 he had been in the casemaking department in charge of a cross-cut saw. The saw was a vertical, revolving circular saw with a movable table on one side and a fixed table on the other for the wood to be cut and the ends or offshoots cut off respectively. The surfaces of the tables were approximately level with the centre of the saw. There was a guard on top of the saw which was supported by a pillar and which came over a riving knife at the back, the operator facing the front edge of the saw. The curve of the riving knife followed the curve of the circumference of the saw and served to keep cut portions of the wood apart and prevent their jamming and also as a fence to prevent the operator's hand from coming into contact with the saw. On Mar. 13, 1950, when about to clean the saw, the plaintiff noticed an offshoot of wood jammed between the pillar which held the guard over the saw and the riving knife. He put his right hand forward to try to remove it, but the end of the wood caught in the teeth of the saw, which was still revolving, and dragged his hand in contact with the blade, causing the middle and index fingers to be severed through the middle phalanges. At the time of the accident the radius of the saw was $9\frac{3}{4}$ inches and the radius of the circle of which the riving knife formed an arc was twelve inches. The gap between the riving knife and the teeth of the saw at table level was seven-sixteenths of an inch and at $4\frac{3}{4}$ inches high, where the riving knife disappeared under the guard, it was, horizontally, approximately $1\frac{1}{2}$ or $1\frac{1}{8}$ inches. The plaintiff contended that the largest saws used on the bench were of a radius considerably less than that of the circle of which the riving knife formed an arc, and that the defendants were, therefore, in breach of reg. 10 (b) (i) of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, and that they were negligent in not providing a safe system of work by reason of the difference between the radius of the saw and of the arc of the riving knife.

Denny for the plaintiff.

Berryman, Q.C., Bassett, Q.C., and Anwyl-Davies for the defendants.

PARKER, J., stated the facts and continued: Regulation 10 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, provides:

"Every circular saw shall be fenced as follows . . . (b) Behind and in a direct line with the saw there shall be a riving knife, which shall have a smooth surface, shall be strong, rigid, and easily adjustable and shall also conform to the following conditions:— (i) The edge of the knife nearer the saw shall form an arc of a circle having a radius not exceeding the radius of the largest saw used on the bench. (ii) The knife shall be maintained as close as practicable to the saw, having regard to the nature of the work being done at the time, and at the level of the bench table the distance between the front edge of the knife and the teeth of the saw shall not exceed half an inch."

From that it is plain that the riving knife is part of the fencing of the machine. The idea is that the curve of the riving knife should follow the curve of the circumference of the blade and should remain as close to the teeth as is reasonably practicable so as to afford the smallest possible gap between the edge of the riving knife and the teeth. The regulation provides that, at table level, the edge of the riving knife shall not be more than half an inch away from the teeth. There is no question that that was done. The regulation also contemplates, by sub-para. (i), that for some reason it may not be practicable always to have fitted a riving knife of which the arc forms a part of a circle of the same radius as the saw. Whether that is due to difficulties of changing riving knives when changing saws or to the riving knife being fitted by the manufacturer to the machine, I do not know, but the effect is that an employer does all that is necessary under the regulation in the way of fencing if, as sub-para. (i) says, the edge of the knife nearer the saw forms an arc of a circle having a radius not exceeding the radius of the largest saw used on the bench.

The wording of reg. 10 (b) (i) is curious, and it is very difficult to say what it actually means. I am satisfied, however, that it does not mean "capable of being used," or "designed to be used." It does not say the largest saw the

A machine is capable of taking, or for which it is designed to be used, and such construction would produce the very odd result that a factory occupier might order a machine capable of taking a twenty-four inch blade and deliberately, thereafter and for all time, only use an eighteen inch blade. If that were right the riving knife, which is part of the fencing, might for all time leave a gap of inches at the point at which it went under the guard. I am also satisfied that the paragraph does not mean "has at some time been used". Again it does not say so, and again the curious position would result of a purchaser being able to use a twenty-four inch saw for a week or two and for the rest of the machine's life only an eighteen inch saw because the machine worked better with it. Nor does the paragraph mean "used daily or constantly used" because, again, it does not say so.

B The question is largely a matter of degree—how often the twenty-four inch saw is used as opposed to another saw in the sense of at what intervals and how often throughout a day, or whatever the period being considered is. The question to be asked is whether in the light of all the circumstances the twenty-four inch saw, in a general sense, is used on the bench. Whatever the true view is, I am satisfied that in this case it cannot be said that a twenty-four inch saw was not used on this bench within the regulation. The machine was bought in 1930 with C purchases of replacements can be proved (two new twenty-four inch blades in 1945 or 1946 and an order for a new twenty-four inch blade in February, 1948, the blade not being delivered owing to market conditions till April, 1950), it shows purchases of twenty-four inch saws, and I am entitled to infer, on the evidence, D that when the blades were replaced, they were replaced by twenty-four inch blades. In the intervals between purchases, the blades, no doubt, would be of varying diameters from time to time, going down, as they did in this case, from twenty-four inches to the 19½ inches of the blade at the time of the accident, through the continuous sharpening of the tips and the re-gulleting (cutting deeper by filing) of the indentations. But it does not seem to me that it can be said that E twenty-four inch saws were not used on the bench within the meaning of this regulation merely because, for a time, they became of less diameter and for another period of time (albeit a long time owing to market conditions) a twenty-four inch replacement was not obtainable. Accordingly, I do not think that in this case there has been any breach of the regulations.

HIS LORDSHIP found that there had been no negligence on the part of the defendants at common law.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors: Rowley, Ashworth & Co. (for the plaintiff); Stuart H. Lewis (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

BARKER v. BARKER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), March 6, April 7, 1952.]

Divorce—Maintenance of wife—Secured maintenance—General charge on all husband's assets—Covenant under seal to pay annual sum—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 19 (2).

On the dissolution of their marriage a husband was ordered to secure to the wife for her life until further order the annual sum of £300 less tax by "a general charge on all of [the husband's] assets" with a provision for reference to the conveyancing counsel of the court to settle the necessary deed or deeds in default of agreement between the parties.

HELD: (i) the order directing a general charge on all the husband's assets was oppressive in effect, uncertain in operation, difficult of enforcement, and of doubtful validity, and it was difficult to resist the conclusion that an order in that form offended against the principle that orders should not be made to bring pressure to bear on a husband or on other persons to make provision for a wife which otherwise they could not be required to make;

Howard v. Howard ([1945] 1 All E.R. 91), applied.

(ii) under s. 19 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, it was not open to the court to make an order for security in the form of a covenant under seal by the husband to pay the specified annual sum during the life of the wife with or without a charge of the annual sum in question on specified assets;

(iii) the present order could not stand, and in lieu thereof the husband would be ordered to secure to the wife £100 per annum by a charge on certain shares with a proviso that that annual sum was to be paid only out of the income of the shares or of any investments from time to time representing the same and that the charge should be non-cumulative.

AS TO ORDERS FOR MAINTENANCE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 798, para. 1269; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 502-505, Nos. 5379-5396.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Kelcey, [1899] 2 Ch. 530; 68 L.J.Ch. 742; sub nom. Re Finn-Kelcey, 81 L.T. 354; 35 Digest 266, 251.
- (2) Howard v. Howard, [1945] 1 All E.R. 91; [1945] P. 1; 114 L.J.P. 11; 172 L.T. 38; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Medley v. Medley, (1882), 7 P.D. 122; 51 L.J.P. 74; 47 L.T. 556; 27 Digest 508, 5468.
- (4) Shearn v. Shearn, [1931] P. 1; 100 L.J.P. 41; 143 L.T. 772; Digest Supp.
- (5) Yates (Inspector of Taxes) v. Starkey, [1951] 1 All E.R. 732; [1951] Ch. 465.

APPEAL by the husband, the respondent in a divorce suit, against orders of COLLINGWOOD, J., and PEARCE, J., dismissing the husband's appeals from orders of Mr. Registrar LONG by which he directed that an annual sum of £300 less tax secured maintenance for the wife be secured by a general charge on all of the husband's assets.

Beyfus, Q.C., and J. Stirling for the husband.

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and E. O. Roberts for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 7. JENKINS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal (by special leave of this court) by the husband, Eric Albert Barker, from an order of COLLINGWOOD, J., dated June 14, 1951, dismissing his appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar LONG dated May 1, 1951, and also from an order of PEARCE, J., dated Nov. 13, 1951, dismissing his appeal from a further order of the same registrar dated Aug. 2, 1951, the two orders of the registrar thus unsuccessfully appealed from having been made on the application of the wife, Ida Irene Behenna Barker, for maintenance consequent on the dissolution, on her petition, of her marriage to the husband on the ground of his desertion.

By his order dated May 1, 1951 (which we will call "the first order") Mr. Registrar LONG directed that the husband should secure to the wife for her life until further order as from the date of the decree absolute (namely, May 12, 1951) the annual sum of £300 less tax until Dudley Eric Reynolds Barker, the child of the marriage, should attain the age of twenty-one years, and thereafter the annual sum of £200 less tax, both sums to be payable by monthly instalments and to be secured on security to be selected by the husband, provided that, in default of agreement as to the nature of the security, either party was to be at liberty to apply to the registrar, and that, in default of agreement as to the form of the necessary deed or deeds, the settling thereof be referred to conveyancing counsel of the court. By the same order it was further directed that the husband should pay to the wife as from the same date during their joint lives until further order maintenance at the rate of £400 per annum less tax by monthly instalments, and as from the same date maintenance for the child until further order at the rate of £120 per annum free of tax by monthly instalments. The husband took exception to the amount of the secured maintenance awarded by the first order, and appealed to the judge in chambers, but COLLINGWOOD, J., who heard the appeal, dismissed it by his order of June 14, 1951, on the ground (as we were told) that the husband's proper course was to apply to Mr. Registrar LONG for any variation of the first order to which the husband considered himself entitled.

On the matter coming before Mr. Registrar LONG again he, by his order of Aug. 2, 1951 (which we will call "the second order") directed that the annual sum of £300 less tax referred to in the first order should be "secured by a general charge on all of" the husband's "assets", with a provision for reference to conveyancing counsel of the court to settle the necessary deed or deeds in default of agreement between the parties. The second order was the subject of a further appeal to the judge in chambers, but PEARCE, J., who heard the appeal, dismissed it by his order of Nov. 13, 1951, though giving the husband liberty to apply within fourteen days to Mr. Registrar LONG as to an alternative method of securing the annual sum of £300.

The husband now appeals from the orders dismissing his appeals from the first and second orders of the registrar. The grounds of his present appeal are substantially, first, that the form of security directed by the second order, namely, "a general charge on all of" the husband's "assets" is wrong in principle, and, secondly, that, having regard to the husband's circumstances, and the nature and value of, and prior charges on, his capital assets, the annual sum of £300, reducible to £200 when the child attains twenty-one, directed to be secured is excessive in amount and has not been fixed in accordance with the principles on which the discretion conferred on the court by the relevant statutory provisions ought to be exercised, and, in particular, is in disregard of "the ability of" the husband. The husband has not been primarily concerned to complain of the total amount which he has been called on to pay or provide, namely, £940 per annum gross (approximately), but he has strenuously contended that on a proper exercise of the court's discretion he should not, and cannot, be called on, at least at the present time, to "secure" to the wife any annual sum approaching £300 or even £200.

Before passing to a consideration of the relevant statutory provisions we will briefly summarise the evidence as to the circumstances of the parties. The wife has no means of her own apart from savings certificates worth (at the date of her affidavit sworn on April 16, 1951) £738 ls. 2d., an insurance policy the surrender value of which then amounted to £301 5s., and furniture and effects valued by her at £100, and she has to maintain the child of the marriage. The husband was, at the date of his affidavit of means sworn on Feb. 9, 1951, employed by a company at a salary of £2,000. That company is a private company with an issued capital of £15,730 divided into 15,380 ordinary and 350 preference shares of £1 each, held as to five thousand ordinary and two hundred preference shares by the husband, as to 10,280 ordinary and 150 preference shares by his father, and as to the remaining hundred ordinary shares by his mother. The company has been carrying on a large volume of business—according to the figures put in evidence its total sales during the calendar year 1950 amounted to close on £1,000,000—but clearly it is, and has at all material times been, short of working capital. At the end of the same calendar year, 1950, it appears that the company owed to its bankers £114,566, and to trade creditors the still larger figure of £165,600, and we were told in the course of the hearing that since the affidavits before us were sworn a receiver has been appointed by the bank as debenture holder of the company and that the receiver has since his appointment continued the employment of the husband in the company's business at a reduced salary of £1,250 per annum. In addition to his holding of five thousand ordinary and two hundred preference shares of the company the husband owns (i) the freehold house bought in 1946 for £3,250, which is his home, but which is subject to a first mortgage for £3,000 and a second mortgage in favour of his father of £3,750 with arrears of interest amounting at the date of his affidavit of means to £469; (ii) furniture valued at £1,000; (iii) a motor launch valued at £350; (iv) savings certificates worth at the date of his affidavit of means £504, and £750 three per cent. savings bonds, both these assets being charged to a bank to secure an overdraft amounting on July 2, 1951, to £544 6s., making the net value of these two assets about £710; (v) two policies of insurance on his life with an aggregate surrender value as at the date of his affidavit of means of £1,320.

It is, we think, not beside the point since it has a bearing on the affairs of the company, to refer to the circumstances in which the husband's house came to be charged to the extent that it is. At the time of its acquisition the husband's father appears to have advanced to the husband the money required for the purchase, together with a further sum of £500 for its equipment (£3,750 in all), taking an equitable charge by deposit with him (the father) of the deeds of the house. When, at a later stage, it became a matter of urgency to provide further liquid resources for the company, it was arranged that the maximum sum possible should be raised by way of first mortgage on the husband's house and made available to the company. The sum that was procured by this means was £3,000 and thereupon the husband's father released his charge and possession of the deeds to enable the mortgage to be effected, taking himself a second charge for the sum due to him, namely, £3,750. Interest at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is payable in respect of the sum due on the first mortgage and interest at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is payable on the loan from his father to the husband, but at the present time this latter interest is five years in arrear, and, as already mentioned, the sum due in respect thereof at the date of the husband's affidavit of means was £469.

It will thus be seen that (disregarding the house as mortgaged for more than its full value, even if it is permissible to regard its value as being to some extent in excess of its purchase price) the husband's net assets, apart from his holding of shares in the company, consist of the equity of redemption in the savings certificates and savings bonds, £710; the surrender value of the policies, £1,320; the furniture, £1,000; and the motor launch, £350, a total of £3,380, as against which his father must be considered as an unsecured creditor to an extent of £3,000 at least in respect of the deficiency in his security for principal and interest consisting of his second charge on the house. It is further to be observed that none of these assets as they stand produces any income apart from £22 10s. from the savings bonds. On the other hand, the husband is liable for interest on the mortgage and second charge and on the overdraft. It would, however,

A be possible, by realising all these assets and ignoring altogether the father's claim as an unsecured creditor, to provide a fund of, say, £3,000 or (leaving the husband his furniture, of which it would hardly be reasonable to deprive him) of, say, £2,000 which when invested might be expected to provide, say, £70 to £80 per annum for the wife. This would involve stripping the husband of virtually all his capital assets except his holding of shares in the company, besides leaving him over £3,000 in his father's debt. As to the husband's five thousand ordinary and two hundred preference shares of the company they are not producing, and, according to the evidence, never have produced, any income, and, though the company appears to have made a net profit during the calendar year 1950 of £6,825, it is not surprising that, in the circumstances, no part of this sum was or could have been distributed by way of dividend. The future prospects of the company's business are, therefore, at best, problematical, though, in view of the large volume of turnover, there seems at least a possibility that the husband's shares may ultimately turn out to be of value.

B What, in these circumstances, is the proper course to take as regards secured maintenance for the wife during her life and the son during his minority as distinct from unsecured payments during the joint lives of the husband and the wife? The relevant statutory provisions now in force are these. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, by s. 19 provides:

C “(2) On any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, the court may, if it thinks fit, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as, having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the court may deem to be reasonable; and the court may for that purpose order that it shall be referred to one of the conveyancing counsel of the court to settle and approve a proper deed or instrument to be executed by all the necessary parties, and may, if it thinks fit, suspend the pronouncing of the decree until the deed or instrument has been duly executed. (3) On any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, the court may, if it thinks fit, by order direct the husband to pay to the wife, during their joint lives, such monthly or weekly sum for the maintenance and support of the wife as the court may think reasonable, and any such order may either be in addition to or be instead of an order made under the last foregoing sub-section.”

D Any order made under either sub-section of s. 19 may now be subsequently varied by further order, for, by s. 28, it is (so far as relevant) provided:

E “(1) Where the court has made an order under s. 19, s. 20, s. 22, s. 23 or s. 24 (2) of this Act, the court shall have power to discharge or vary the order or to suspend any provision thereof temporarily and to revive the operation of any provisions so suspended . . . (2) The powers exercisable by the court under this section in relation to any order shall be exercisable also in relation to any deed or other instrument executed in pursuance of the order. (3) In exercising the powers conferred by this section, the court shall have regard to all the circumstances of the case, including any increase or decrease in the means of either of the parties to the marriage.”

F Before passing to the more difficult question, what security and for what amount can properly be ordered in the present case, we can dispose quite shortly of the form of security directed by the second order. Whatever else may be right, we must express our disapproval of an order that the sum awarded is to be secured by “a general charge on all of” the husband's “assets”. If the charge ordered to be given in these sweeping and indiscriminate terms is to be understood as comprising all of the husband's assets at the date of the order (or, alternatively, at the date of the deed giving effect to it), then it would include everything that the husband had in the world, even his clothes and personal effects, the loose change in his pockets, and any balance due to him in respect of salary at the date in question. The whole of his assets at that date (including such items as we have mentioned) would be completely frozen. If, on the other hand, what is intended is a floating charge of like scope, but extending to assets present and future, then its effect would, apparently, be to leave the husband free to deal with his assets as he chose until the wife or trustees as holders of the charge on her behalf intervened to enforce the security when it would attach to every single thing then possessed by the husband. In either case the charge, so far as it related to personal chattels, would be void unless registered as a bill of sale, and (if the security was intended to operate as a floating charge) it would, so far as we can see, necessarily be void under the Bills of Sale Acts as regards the personal chattels comprised therein owing to the impossibility of complying with the statutory requirements as to form and registration.

Counsel for the wife submitted that the "general charge" intended by the second order was a floating charge, and he endeavoured to support it by reference to precedent 272 in the ENCYCLOPAEDIA OF FORMS AND PRECEDENTS, 3rd ed., vol. 10, p. 611, and to Re Kelcey (1), as showing that general charges of this description were not necessarily invalid or ineffective as to some kinds of property or assets. He admitted the difficulty we have mentioned, but this difficulty, together with the palpable absurdity of including in the charge such things as clothes and personal effects, he sought to surmount by saying that the true intention of the second order was to exclude personal chattels and to leave it to conveyancing counsel to select such assets or types of asset as could appropriately be charged and to settle a suitable form of charge on the assets or types of asset so selected. This surely will not do. It is for the court to specify the assets on which the security is to be given and not to delegate its discretion in the matter to conveyancing counsel. Nor does the second order in fact purport to effect any such delegation. It directs in plain terms a general charge on all of the husband's assets and must be construed as meaning what it says. So construed, it seems to us to direct a charge which would be at once oppressive in effect, uncertain in operation, difficult of enforcement, and of doubtful validity. We find it, indeed, difficult to resist the conclusion that such an order offends against the principle stated by this court in 1945 in Howard v. Howard (2), namely, that orders under the sub-section should not be used in terrorem in order to bring pressure to bear on a respondent husband (and on other persons) to contrive to make provision for a wife which they could not otherwise be required to do. It follows, therefore, in our view, that the second order cannot stand.

The question then arises what security, if any, should, in all the circumstances of the case, be directed in place of the general charge directed by the second order and for what amount. It is, at first sight, an attractive solution to construe the language of s. 19 (2) as framed in terms sufficiently wide to include an order for security in the form of a covenant by the husband to pay a specified annual sum during the life of the wife with or without a charge of the annual sum in question on specified assets of his. If this were a legitimate application of s. 19 (2), it would provide a convenient method to adopt in a case like the present case in which the husband has assets of considerable potential value, but not for the moment producing any income or being readily convertible into income-bearing assets, and is also possessed of a substantial earned income. A fair result might well be produced in such a case by fixing the total annual amount which the husband could reasonably be required to pay to the wife having regard to the amount of his earned income for the time being, directing the husband to enter into a covenant to pay a suitable proportion of that annual amount to the wife during her life, and, further, directing him to charge any asset capable of being conveniently charged as security for the covenanted sum, but on terms that no steps were to be taken to enforce the charge so long as the covenanted sum was duly paid. Security by way of covenant would also be a convenient and suitable form of security in the possible case of a husband with no chargeable or readily chargeable capital assets, but possessed of a large income held for his life on protective trusts for his benefit, and, therefore, incapable of being charged. And no hardship would now be caused to a husband by dealing with the question of secured maintenance in this way, for under s. 28 (1) and (2) the amount of the covenanted payment could be reduced or extinguished by the court in the event of his circumstances changing for the worse, while the wife would be accorded some measure of protection against the contingency of the husband's death and the consequent cessation of any unsecured maintenance. As the law stood before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, secured maintenance had to be irrevocably fixed once and for all, and in those circumstances security by way of covenant, as opposed to charge or transfer of assets capable of producing the amount of secured maintenance ordered, would have been fraught with a risk of hardship to the husband which in view of s. 28 no longer obtains.

It appears that such a construction is contrary to the view that has consistently been taken in practice of the effect of the sub-section and its statutory predecessors. Provision for securing a gross or annual sum to a wife was first contained in s. 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, the terms of that section being, so far as relevant, substantially identical with those of s. 19 (2) of the Act of 1950. The Act of 1857 made no other provision for the maintenance of a wife, and there was no power to order payments to be made by a husband to a wife in a divorce case apart from interim orders for payment of money by way of alimony or otherwise such as the court would have ordered in suits instituted for judicial separation. The omission was remedied by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, the second recital in the preamble of which was:

"And whereas it sometimes happens that a decree for dissolution of marriage is obtained against a husband who has no property on which the payment of any such gross or annual sum can be secured, but nevertheless he would be able to make a monthly or weekly payment to the wife during their joint lives."

Section 1 of the Act then proceeded to confer on the court power to order the payment by a husband to a wife of maintenance during the joint lives in terms corresponding to those now comprised in s. 19 (3) of the Act of 1950, with a power for the court, in the circumstances mentioned, thereafter to discharge or modify any such order.

In Medley v. Medley (3) the question arose in this court whether the powers contained in s. 32 of the Act of 1857 and s. 1 of the Act of 1866 were cumulative or alternative. The decision was in favour of the latter view, a result which was reversed by s. 1 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1907. In the course of their judgments in Medley v. Medley (3) the members of the Court of Appeal discussed the proper interpretation to be given to the word "secure" in the Act of 1857 which (though the question was not necessary to the decision of the case) seems at any rate to be inconsistent with the conception that a covenant for payment of an annual sum was comprehended within the "security" contemplated by the Act of 1857. Thus, SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., after referring to the recital which we have quoted from the Act of 1866, concluded that the word "secure" in the Act of 1857 should be given a meaning contrasted with that of the word "pay", and said (7 P.D. 125):

"Therefore it appears to me that it was not intended by the first Act that an order should be made for payment of the allowance directly by the husband to the wife".

Similarly, LINDLEY, L.J., said (ibid.):

"I think it is clear that [the word 'secure'] does not include payment, but that the sum gross or annual was to be secured so as to provide a fund for the wife".

As we have said, this view of the limited significance of the word "secure" appears to have been followed ever since: see, for example, per HILL, J., in Shearn v. Shearn (4). And there is the further question whether—at any rate in the absence of the clearest words in the statute—it would be in accordance with principle to order a man to enter into a promise (as would be involved in a deed of covenant) to which he had not already assented: see also the distinction drawn between orders to secure and orders to pay by HODSON, L.J., in Yates (Inspector of Taxes) v. Starkey (5). We do not, therefore, think that we should now depart (even if it were open to us to do so) from what appears to have been the settled practice of the court in the matter of secured maintenance.

The question, therefore, is: What security (if any) in the form of actual assets can the husband be reasonably required to provide and for what annual amount? As to amount, it seems to us reasonably plain that he cannot now provide assets sufficient to secure £300 per annum or anything like that figure. Nor do we think it reasonable that he should be required to surrender his policies or recover from the bank, with a view to charging them, his savings certificates or savings bonds, or the balances thereof remaining after discharging his overdraft. The house is already charged for something like twice its value, and we see no ground on which the husband's father could in effect be compelled to surrender his second charge. The husband clearly should not be made to sell his furniture. The motor launch might, no doubt, be sold without hardship to him, but the amount is hardly worth troubling about. In substance what is left is his holding of 5,200 shares in the company, which are unrealisable and producing no income at present, but, nevertheless, are of potential value. In all the circumstances we think the best that can be done will be to order the husband to secure to the wife £100 per annum by a charge on the 5,200 shares, with a proviso that this annual sum is to be paid only out of the income of the shares or of any investments from time to time representing the same, such charge to be non-cumulative. We think this form of security is warranted by the section, and, although it has obvious imperfections, it will at all events secure something to the wife in the event of the company recovering from its present difficulties.

We think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, that the second order should be set aside, and that the first order should be varied by substituting for the provision made thereby for securing an income to the wife of £300 per annum for her life (reducible as therein mentioned) a provision providing for the sum of £100 per annum to be secured to her for her life in the manner above mentioned, it being, if necessary, referred to conveyancing counsel of the court to settle the necessary instrument of security. In the course of his argument counsel for the husband, as we understood him, was disposed to submit to an order for the payment of unsecured maintenance to the aggregate annual amount of the secured and unsecured maintenance provided for by the first and second orders, so long as the provisions in regard to secured maintenance were discharged. On this basis it would seem that the annual sum ordered to be paid during the joint lives should be increased by £300 (reducible as mentioned in the first order) less such amount as may be provided in any year during the joint lives by means of the security now to be ordered. We are, however, prepared to hear counsel further as to the amount of unsecured maintenance which should be awarded in view of our decision as to the secured maintenance.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Withers & Co. (for the husband); C. M. A. Baker (for the wife).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

TAYLOR (formerly RYAN) v. CHELTENHAM & HEREFORD BREWERIES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning, and Romer, L.JJ.), April 7, 8, 1952.]

Practice—Payment out of court—Fatal accident—Damages recovered by widow paid into court—Re-marriage—Right of widow to payment out—R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (9).

On Mar. 15, 1951, an action by the applicant under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, in respect of the death of her husband, was settled on the terms, inter alia, that the defendants paid into court £2,000 to be invested on the applicant's behalf. On Sept. 29, 1951, the applicant re-married, and she then applied to the master for payment out of court of the sum invested on the ground that, on re-marriage, she ceased to be the "widow of the person killed" within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (9), and, that the court no longer had control over the money.

HELD: the words "widow of the person killed" in Ord. 22, r. 14 (9), were words of identification of an individual and not of status; although on re-marriage the applicant changed her status from that of a widow to that of a married woman, she remained the person who, as a widow, was entitled to recover under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908; and, therefore, she was not entitled to payment of the money out of court.

Johnston v. Liston (H.) & Co. ([1920] 1 K.B. 99) and Re Embleton ([1946] 2 All E.R. 542), distinguished.

Hamer v. Cunard White Star, Ltd. The Queen Mary ([1952] 1 All E.R. 787), not approved.

FOR R.S.C., ORD. 22, r. 14 (3) and (9), see ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1951, Vol. 1, pp. 402 and 406.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Johnston v. Liston (H.) & Co., [1920] 1 K.B. 99; 88 L.J.K.B. 1152; 121 L.T. 626; 12 B.W.C.C. 224; 34 Digest 448, 3676.
- (2) Re Embleton, [1946] 2 All E.R. 542; [1947] K.B. 142; [1947] L.J.R. 423; 175 L.T. 451; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Hamer v. Cunard White Star, Ltd. The Queen Mary, [1952] 1 All E.R. 787.

APPEAL by the applicant from an order of DONOVAN, J., made on Feb. 28, 1952, affirming an order of Master BURNAND on an application for payment out of money held by the court pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (3),

On Nov. 2, 1950, the applicant, Winifred May Taylor, brought an action in the High Court on behalf of herself and her two children under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in respect of the death of her then husband, Douglas Ryan. On Mar. 15, 1951, the action was stayed by an order of the master, made by consent, under which the defendants agreed to pay to the applicant £650 in settlement of her claim under the Act of 1934, and the sum of £2,850 was to be paid into court in respect of the claim under the Fatal Accidents Act to be invested as to £350 for the benefit of the infant daughter, as to £500 for the benefit of the infant son, and as to £2,000 for the benefit of the applicant. On Sept. 29, 1951, the applicant married Albert James Taylor. Thereupon, she applied to the master for payment out of the £2,000 on the ground that, on re-marriage, the court no longer had any discretion with regard to the fund. The master held that although by re-marriage the applicant changed her status from widow to married woman, she remained the "widow of the person killed" within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (9), and that re-marriage alone was not grounds for making an order for payment out.

Castle-Miller for the applicant.

J. P. Ashworth for the Attorney-General, as amicus curiae.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of DONOVAN, J. who confirmed a ruling given by Master BURNAND. The applicant is now Mrs. Taylor. She was formerly Mrs. Ryan. Her husband, Mr. Ryan, lost his life in an accident while employed by the Cheltenham & Hereford Breweries, Ltd. The circumstances were such that she brought an action claiming damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. That action was begun on Nov. 2, 1950, and on Mar. 15, 1951, it was settled on terms. The relevant term regarding the claim under the Fatal Accidents Act is:

"That the defendants do within fourteen days pay into court the sum of £2,850 such sum to be invested in $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. War Stock for the benefit of Joan Ryan the infant daughter of the plaintiff as to £350 and of Graham Ryan the infant son of the plaintiff as to £500 and of the plaintiff as to £2,000 the dividends of all three funds to accumulate."

A sum of £650 in settlement of her claim under the Act of 1934 was paid out to Mrs. Ryan. The £2,000 was paid into the High Court. The apportionment was made in accordance with s. 2 of the Act of 1846 which provides:

"... Every ... action [in respect of death caused by negligence] shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent and child of the person whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased; and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought; and the amount so recovered, after deducting the costs not recovered from the defendant, shall be divided amongst the before-mentioned parties in such shares as the jury by their verdict shall find and direct."

On Sept. 29, 1951, Mrs. Ryan re-married, and she then made an application to Master BURNAND for payment out of the £2,000. The secretary to the master replied in these terms to her solicitors.

"Your application on behalf of Mrs. Taylor (formerly Ryan) is that an order shall be made for payment out of court to her of the whole of her fund on the sole ground that she has re-married since the order was made on Mar. 15, 1951, and that the court has no longer any discretion with regard to the fund. Master BURNAND has directed me to state that he is unable to accept your view that the court no longer has a discretion in the matter. He cannot make an order for the payment out on the grounds only of the re-marriage. Order 22, r. 14 (3) and (9), of the Rules of the Supreme Court make it necessary for the court to control the dealings with the fund of 'the widow of the person killed'. If 'the widow of the person killed' recovers money under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, she does not cease to have been 'the widow of the person killed' by reason of her having become the wife of another man. By re-marriage she changes her status from widow to married woman, but she remains 'the widow of the person killed' who recovered money under the Fatal Accidents Acts. If Mrs. Taylor desires on good ground to have an order made for payment out of the whole or part of her fund, the master will consider the grounds on which such an application is made and so exercise the discretion given to the court by Ord. 22, r. 14 (3)."

DONOVAN, J., confirmed the view expressed by the master in this letter. R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 provides:

"(1) In any cause or matter ... in which money ... is ... claimed ... on behalf of an infant or a person of unsound mind suing either alone or in conjunction with other parties, no settlement or compromise or payment or acceptance of money paid into court, whether before or at or after the trial, shall as regards the claims of any such infant or person of unsound mind be valid without the approval of the court or a judge. (2) No money (which expression for the purposes of this rule includes damages) in any way recovered or adjudged or ordered or awarded or agreed to be paid in any such cause or matter in respect of the claims of any such infant or person of unsound mind, whether by verdict or by settlement, compromise payment, payment into court or otherwise, before or at or after the trial, shall be paid to the plaintiff or to the next friend of the plaintiff or to the plaintiff's solicitor unless the court or a judge shall so direct."

Paragraph (3) provides:

"All money so recovered or adjudged or ordered or awarded or agreed to be paid shall be dealt with as the court or a judge shall direct and the said money or any part thereof may be so directed—(i) to be paid into the High Court and to be invested or otherwise dealt with there; (ii) to be paid into the High Court and transferred to or where the money has been paid into the High Court to be transferred to, the county court of the district in which the infant or person of unsound mind resides . . ."

Paragraph (4) provides that the court or judge may give any general or special direction as to how the money is to be applied or dealt with and as to any payment to be made either directly or out of the amount paid into court. Paragraph (9) provides:

"The provisions of this rule shall also apply to all actions in which damages are claimed or recovered by or on behalf of or adjudged or ordered or awarded or agreed to be paid to an infant or person of unsound mind under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and also to money which under those Acts is recovered by or adjudged to be paid to the widow of the person killed as they apply to money recovered by or adjudged or ordered to be paid to an infant. Where such proceedings are taken by or for the benefit of more than one person and the amount recovered is to be divided amongst such persons, the judge or jury as the case may be shall divide and apportion the share to be paid to each of the said persons and the amount so apportioned shall be specified in the order or judgment made or directed in the High Court."

The first case in which this type of question was dealt with was Johnston v. H. Liston & Co. (1), which was concerned with r. 53 of the Workman's Compensation Rules, 1913, which provided as follows:

"Where an agreement is made for the payment of a lump sum in lieu of a weekly payment to a person under any legal disability, or for the redemption by a lump sum of a weekly payment payable to a person under any legal disability, and a memorandum thereof has been recorded in accordance with the Act and these rules, such sum shall be paid into court, and shall be invested, applied, or otherwise dealt with by the court in such manner as the court in its discretion thinks fit for the benefit of the person entitled thereto . . ."

In accordance with that rule a sum of money had been paid into court in respect of an accident within the Act to an infant workman. On attaining twenty-one, the workman applied for the money to be paid out to him and this court held that he was entitled to have it paid to him. WARRINGTON, L.J., said ([1920] 1 K.B. 103):

"The Act could, of course, impose any restriction the legislature thought fit on the right of a person of full age and not otherwise under any disability to dispose as he pleases of his own property, and some people may think it desirable to maintain the condition of pupillage notwithstanding the termination of the legal period of infancy, but in my opinion the court ought not to be astute to discover such a restriction of the rights of property, and ought not to hold it to be imposed except by express words or by necessary implication."

Then he said he could find nothing of the kind in that rule, and he analysed the particular words of the rule. DUKE, L.J., and ATKIN, L.J., agreed.

A
A similar, though not the present, problem, came before this court in Re Embleton (2). That case was concerned, not with the rules of court which we have to construe, but with provisions in the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 164, which deal with the same subject-matter—infants and persons of unsound mind, on the one hand, and widows, on the other, in respect of whom sums recovered under the Fatal Accidents Acts are paid into court. Though the wording is somewhat different, I have come to the conclusion that the effect of the provisions there dealt with is the same as the effect of the rule which we have to construe. B
The County Courts Act, 1934, s. 164, provides:

"(1) Where in any cause or matter in the King's Bench Division of the High Court, or in an Admiralty action in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of that court, money is in any manner recovered by or on behalf of, or adjudged or ordered to be paid to or for the benefit of, a person who is an infant or of unsound mind, the High Court or a judge thereof may order the money or any part thereof to be paid into or transferred to the county court of the district in which that person resides or such other county court as the High Court or judge may order. (2) On the making of any such order, the money or the part thereof to which the order relates shall be paid or transferred according to the order, and shall, subject to any special order or direction of the High Court or a judge thereof, and to county court rules and to the County Court Funds Rules, or the Mayor's and City of London Court Funds Rules, as the case may be, be invested, applied or otherwise dealt with for the benefit of the person to whom the order relates in such manner as the county court in its discretion thinks fit. (3) The provisions of this section shall apply to money which in proceedings under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, is recovered by or adjudged or ordered to be paid to the widow of the person killed as they apply to money recovered by or adjudged or ordered to be paid to an infant." C
D
E

F
In that case, again, the court was concerned with an infant in respect of whom money recovered had been paid into the county court under the Act and who had become twenty-one. This court held that the discretionary control of the fund terminated on the infant's coming of age and the whole fund must be paid out on his application. They applied Johnston v. H. Liston & Co. (1), and MORTON, L.J., set out in his judgment the passage which I have cited from the judgment of WARRINGTON, L.J. I agree with that decision to which, indeed, G
I was a party, because it seems to me clear that, with regard to people who are under a legal disability, the principles laid down in Johnston's case (1) apply to the provisions which had to be construed in Embleton's case (2). MORTON, L.J., in what is admittedly a dictum, went on to say ([1946] 2 All E.R. 544):

"There is one possible distinction between the present case and Johnston v. H. Liston & Co. (1). In s. 164 (3) the provisions of the section are applied to money 'adjudged or ordered to be paid to the widow of the person killed'. Now, the widow of a person killed would not be a person under any legal disability and, therefore, the passage from WARRINGTON, L.J.'s judgment which I have read would not apply verbatim to the case of a widow. I think, however, it would be drawing far too fine a distinction to say that the present case can be distinguished from Johnston v. H. Liston & Co. (1) on that ground. In my view, the application of the reasoning of H WARRINGTON, L.J., to the case of a widow would be that the words 'for the benefit of the person to whom the order relates' mean for the benefit of a person already described, namely, a person who is the widow of the person killed, and when the person in question ceases to answer that description the discretion ceases also. Thus, if the widow re-married, she would be entitled to have the money paid out to her. That case is not before us, but it seems to me that that result must logically follow."

A similar problem came before LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Hamer v. Cunard White Star, Ltd. The Queen Mary (3). It arose over a question of taxation of costs, the details of which do not matter. There was there, as here, a widow who had re-married. The learned President referred to the observations of MORTON, L.J., namely, that the discretion would cease on her re-marriage, and though, as he points out, they are obiter, he says ([1952] 1 All E.R. 789):

"... they form so integral a part of the reasoning on which that case was decided, that I would hesitate long before dissenting, even if I disagreed with them. As I entirely agree with them, I accept them gladly."

Counsel for the Attorney-General, as amicus curiae, submitted that the decision by the learned President, based as it was on a dictum of MORTON, L.J., was wrong. I think that MORTON, L.J., proceeded on the basis, to some extent, that, unless a widow was treated as ceasing to be subject to control if she re-married, there was difficulty in applying the reasoning of WARRINGTON, L.J., in Johnston's case (1) to s. 164 (1) of the Act of 1934 where the cases of infants or persons of unsound mind were dealt with. I do not find that difficulty. I think that WARRINGTON, L.J.'s reasoning does apply where the basis of the control is legal disability. If the legal disability ceases, there seems no reason why the control should not cease too unless there are express words saying that it is to continue. Just as both in the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 164 (3), and in Ord. 22, r. 14 (9), the widow is separately dealt with, so the construction of the words dealing with her have to be considered by themselves in their context. The basis of WARRINGTON, L.J.'s reasoning does not seem to me to apply to a widow. She is not under any legal disability. In my view, in their context the words of r. 14 (9)—"and also to money which under those Acts is recovered by or adjudged to be paid to the widow of the person killed as they apply to money recovered"—are words of identification of a person rather than words based on a legal disability because of the person's status. On re-marriage the widow does not free herself from a legal disability under which she was before, and, if the words are words of identification, she remains and will always remain the person who, at the time of the death, was the widow entitled to benefit under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846.

The learned judge referred to an example, which is to be found in the Act of 1846, of a word plainly used as a word of identification which is immediately inapplicable if it is regarded as a word defining status. In s. 2 of the Act it is said that the action is to be brought for the benefit of the "wife". Ex hypothesi, by the time the action is brought she will be contemplating something having happened under which she has ceased to be a wife and become a widow. Though I do not say that that assists the construction of Ord. 22, r. 14 (9), it is a good example of the mode of construction of those words in their context, which the learned judge applied and with which I agree. The learned judge went on to consider the purpose of the statute, referring to the similar provisions of s. 164 of the County Courts Act, 1934. There, with respect, I think he went too wide. He referred to the fact that in many cases the widow will be someone of, perhaps, modest means who has not often had a large sum at her disposal. She might waste the money, or, for other reasons which he gives, it might be undesirable that it should not be controlled in her interests. I do not derive much help from that because the same could be said of any lump sum recovered by any man or woman, young or old. There may be many cases in which there are children—and this is one—who, no doubt, themselves will get some apportionment, but where the apportionment to the widow will be on the basis that she will be expected to provide a home with the normal amenities of a home for the family. In such a case as that it might, I think, well-be desirable that the control should continue after a re-marriage. The children may still be there, and what may be described as their interests in the money apportioned to the mother should be subject to control. But neither the rules nor the Act of Parliament restricts the control to cases of women who have children. I do not find any sufficiently clear purpose for the reason for this restriction in this particular class of case to aid me in construing the rule.

Therefore, for the reasons which I have given, I think that these words are words of identification and that the discretion remains in the court notwithstanding that the widow has re-married and in that sense is not aptly described as the widow of the deceased man. It was, however, as the widow that she obtained the money to which, I think, the control continues to attach. In my view, the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. In Re Embleton (2) this court, in effect, wrote into the County Courts Act, 1934, the words "during infancy". We are now asked to follow that decision to its logical conclusion and to write in the words "during widowhood". I do not think we should do this because I am sure that Parliament never intended it. This situation often arises when we are asked to proceed from one decision to another. It is rather like a journey when you come to a fork in the road. You take the one you believe to be right, but before very long you discover that you are going in the wrong direction altogether. The wise traveller then takes the quickest way back to the right road. He does not go blindly on in the wrong direction. In the present case it only needs one illustration to show that we are asked to take the wrong direction. Take a widow who has been awarded £3,000 for the keep of herself and her children. She has been only awarded it because it represents the weekly amount which her husband would have allowed her. She becomes engaged to marry a man who is crippled with debts. If she applies to a master for £2,000 to pay his debts, the master would certainly refuse it. The next day she marries him. Is it to be said that she can forthwith take out the whole £3,000 and use £2,000 of it to pay his debts? Suppose he afterwards deserts her, or dies, and she is left a widow again? She will have lost the maintenance that the £3,000 was intended to provide. This illustration shows that the widow of the deceased needs as much protection during re-marriage as she needed during widowhood. An interpretation of the rules which deprived her of that protection would defeat the intention of Parliament. It is not that she is being kept out of the money. The master, if he thinks fit, will allow her money to help furnish the new home. But it is very salutary for him to continue to have control over it. I find myself in full agreement with Master BURNAND and DONOVAN, J., and all that my Lord has said. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. The argument for the applicant, in effect, is that under Ord. 22, r. 14 (3) and (9), three classes of persons are affected, namely, infants, persons of unsound mind, and widows of persons killed. This court, in Johnston's case (1), said that an infant would be entitled to money paid in on his behalf on attaining twenty-one on the ground that at that age he became relieved of the disability, namely, infancy, which had debarred him from receiving the money earlier. The same process of reasoning would, presumably, result in a person of unsound mind being held entitled on becoming of sound mind because he then becomes relieved of his disability, and should, therefore, be treated in the same way as an infant on his attaining twenty-one. One thus finds, it is argued, two categories which are affected by the order, each under a disability and each entitled to payment when their disabilities are removed. To those categories is added by Ord. 22, r. 14 (9), a third category, widows, and the suggestion is that, to preserve the pattern or symmetry of the matter, an element of removable disability should be introduced in relation to this category similar to that which characterises the other two, and the element of disability suggested is widowhood so that, on re-marriage, the widow rids herself of her disability in the same way as infants do on attaining twenty-one and lunatics do on recovering their sanity.

This argument is not without attraction, but I do not think that it should prevail. While infancy and mental deficiency constitute recognised disabilities in law, widowhood does not, and, so far as I know, never has done, though the status of a married woman did for very many purposes until recently. The characteristic which is common to the first two categories is, accordingly, found wholly wanting in the third, and affords no ground for any presumption of similar treatment. Therefore, one should approach the position of a widow with a mind unaffected by the implications which have been drawn with regard to infants, and the fact that those implications would appear to be equally applicable to persons of unsound mind. Approaching the matter with that independence of view, I can see no grounds for suggesting that a widow becomes freed from the court's discretion when she re-marries. I could not formulate my opinion on that better than it has been expressed by Master BURNAND where he said:

“By re-marriage she changes her status from widow to married woman, but she remains ‘the widow of the person killed’ who recovered money under the Fatal Accidents Act.”

In other words, as my Lord has pointed out, the question is one, not of status, but of personality. One has only to find the person who is affected, and, having found that person, viz., the widow, then the money which has been recovered by or adjudged to be paid to her has to be dealt with in accordance with Ord. 22, r. 14 (3) and (9), and those sub-rules furnish the discretion which remains exercisable in relation to that money.

It is well settled that, if the capital and income of a legacy is given to an infant and the gift is followed by a direction that the capital is not to be paid to the infant until he attains the age of, say, thirty, and there is no gift over in the event of his dying under that age, he can claim payment of the legacy when he attains his majority, the principle being that a man is entitled to possession of property in which no one but he has an interest. The application of that principle is in conformity with the judgment of WARRINGTON, L.J., in Johnston's case (1), but the principle itself is quite irrelevant to the case of a widow where, notwithstanding the absence of any initial disability, the legislature has authorised the retention of what, prima facie, is her own property. I, accordingly, for the reasons which I have tried to express, agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Darracotts (for the applicant); Treasury Solicitor (for the Attorney-General).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

TIDEWAY INVESTMENT AND PROPERTY HOLDINGS, LTD.

v. WELLWOOD. SAME v. ORTON. SAME v. JONES. SAME v.

FRIEDENTAG. SAME v. THORN Affirmed. C.A. [1952] 2 All E.R. 514

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), March 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 11, April 4, 1952.]

Landlord and Tenant—"Improvement"—Installation of individual hot water system—Trespass to landlord's property—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 19 (2). A Rent Restriction—Tenancy within the Acts—Breach of covenant—Failure by landlord to serve notice requiring tenant to remedy breach before expiration of contractual tenancy—Tenant continuing in possession.

Rent Restriction—Possession—Reasonableness—Breach of covenant—Installation of gas water heater—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (1), sched. I, para. (a). B Rent Restriction—Costs—Action in High Court—Claim for possession for breach of covenant imported into statutory tenancy—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 17 (2).

During the war part of a block of flats, including the boiler house which provided heating for the whole block, was destroyed by enemy action. Thirty-three flats which remained intact were requisitioned by the local authority, who provided in each flat a gas geyser for heating water. After the war the part of the block which had been demolished was re-built and now consisted of twenty-two flats and a boiler house. These flats were let on tenancies which expired on Dec. 25, 1950. The rateable value of each flat brought it within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. Although the landlords intended to provide hot water and other services for these flats and the rent was such as to include the cost of services, the tenancy agreement in respect of each of them contained (a) a clause that the landlords undertook no obligations for any services, and, if they furnished any, it would be merely an act of grace on their part, and (b) a covenant by the tenant that he would not make any alteration whatever in the premises or erect any stove or pipe without the written consent of the landlords. In 1948 the present landlords acquired the freehold of the block. On Mar. 23, 1950, on applications by the tenants under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, the rent tribunal reduced the rents of the flats on the basis that the landlords were under no contractual obligation to provide any services. The landlords thereupon withdrew all services, but offered to provide them at an increased rent. They also informed each tenant that alterations necessary to instal individual water heating would be authorised subject to the tenant complying with certain conditions in regard to reinstatement and payment towards the landlords' costs. On Aug. 25, 1950, five of the tenants wrote to the landlords requiring licences for individual installations of gas heaters on the footing that they were "improvements", within the meaning of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 19 (2). The landlords insisted that the application forms should first be signed, but by Oct. 21, 1950, each of the five tenants had installed a gas heater. The fumes of the heater were, in each case, carried out of the flat by flue pipes fixed to the under side of the balcony of the storey above and ending in a baffle protruding beyond the balcony. Each of the thirty-three requisitioned flats had a similar installation. It was held by the court that the balconies, which ran along the outside of the building, and from which access to the flats was obtained, were not demised to the tenants, but remained the landlords' property. On learning at the end of October, 1950, that heaters were already installed by the five tenants, the landlords were willing to waive the breach of covenant which they alleged if the tenants would sign a supplemental agreement, but the tenants refused to do so. On the expiry C
D
E
F
G
H

of the tenancy agreements on Dec. 25, 1950, the tenants retained possession of the flats. In January, 1951, the landlords started actions for possession.

HELD: (i) the installation of a gas water heater constituted an "alteration" within the meaning of the tenant's covenant in each of the tenancy agreements; the installation would have been an "improvement", within the meaning of s. 19 (2) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, but for the existence of the flue pipe, which, being fastened to the balcony, was a trespass on the landlord's property, and, therefore, s. 19 (2) did not apply; the landlords had an absolute right to withhold their consent; and the installation was a breach of covenant which remained unremedied when the tenancy agreement expired.

(ii) assuming that the installation was an "improvement" within the meaning of s. 19 (2), the landlords had not unreasonably withheld their consent, and the tenant was not justified in installing the gas heater without licence or consent, and had, before the end of the contractual tenancy, committed a breach of a covenant in the tenancy agreement which would have justified a claim for forfeiture after service of notice under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (1).

(iii) as the landlords had, in each case, failed to serve a notice requiring the tenant to remedy the breach before the expiration of the contractual tenancy, they were not in a position to forfeit the tenancy before it expired, and, therefore, on Dec. 26, 1950, the tenant acquired a statutory tenancy.

(iv) on the facts, it would not be reasonable to make orders for possession under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), and sched. I, para. (a), or to insist on the removal of the heaters as a condition of withholding the orders, and each of the tenants would be allowed to remain in possession and to maintain his installation subject to his signing an agreement (i) to pay a proper sum towards the landlords' costs and (ii) to deposit a proper sum for the reinstatement of the flat after removing the heater.

(v) the actions being claims for possession against statutory tenants for a breach by each of them of a contractual term imported into his statutory tenancy by s. 15 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, the court was precluded, by s. 17 (2) of the Act, from awarding any costs to the landlords.

AS TO DISCRETION OF COURT AS TO ORDERS FOR POSSESSION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, p. 329, para. 392; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement, Vol. 31, pp. 696, 697, Nos. 7875-7884.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Lambert v. Woolworth (F. W.) & Co., Ltd., [1938] 2 All E.R. 664; [1938] Ch. 883; 107 L.J.K.B. 554; 159 L.T. 317; Digest Supp.
- (2) Balls Bros., Ltd. v. Sinclair, [1931] 2 Ch. 325; 100 L.J.Ch. 377; 146 L.T. 300; Digest Supp.
- (3) Woolworth (F. W.) & Co., Ltd. v. Lambert, [1936] 2 All E.R. 1523; [1937] Ch. 37; 106 L.J.Ch. 15; 155 L.T. 236; Digest Supp.
- (4) Court v. Robinson, [1951] 1 All E.R. 209; [1951] 2 K.B. 60.
- (5) Bell London & Provincial Properties, Ltd. v. Reuben, [1946] 2 All E.R. 547; [1947] K.B. 157; [1947] L.J.R. 251; 176 L.T. 92; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) House Property & Investment Co., Ltd. v. James Walker (Goldsmith & Silversmith), Ltd., [1947] 2 All E.R. 789; [1948] 1 K.B. 257; [1948] L.J.R. 343; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Russoff v. Lipovitch, [1925] 1 K.B. 628; 94 L.J.K.B. 355; 132 L.T. 789; 31 Digest, Replacement, 722, 8054.
- (8) Lee v. Carter (K.), Ltd., [1948] 2 All E.R. 690; [1949] 1 K.B. 85; [1949] L.J.R. 7; 2nd Digest Supp.

CONSOLIDATED ACTIONS by the landlords of a block of flats for possession of five of the flats.

In each case the tenancy agreement, which expired on Dec. 25, 1950, contained a covenant by the tenant not to make any alteration in the premises, nor to erect any stove or pipe without the consent of the landlords. In October, 1950, the tenant installed a gas water heater without the landlords' permission. On learning this, the landlords were willing to waive the alleged breach of covenant on certain conditions, but the tenant refused to comply with the conditions. After the contractual tenancy expired, the tenant remained in possession of the flat, and in January, 1951, the landlords started an action for possession on the ground of breach of covenant.

A. R. Campbell for the landlords.

L. A. Blundell for the tenants.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 4. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. These five actions, by consent heard together, are brought by the freeholders of a block of flats in the borough of Hammersmith situate in Hartington Road, Chiswick, and known as Hartington Court. The five defendants are the occupiers, respectively, of five of the flats, and the plaintiffs' claim in each case is for possession of one of them.

The block was built before the outbreak of the war in 1939. It consisted of a building round three sides of a courtyard divided into fifty-six flats, all provided with hot water and some degree of central heating by a single system operated by the then landlords, who also furnished various other services, such as porters, the lighting and cleaning of the passages, the clearing of dustbins and the maintenance of a garden in the courtyard. About the rents before the war I know nothing and they are not relevant for the present purpose. During the war heavy damage was done to the property, the transverse portion being demolished together with the boiler house providing the heating, and at or before the end of the war the Hammersmith borough council requisitioned the thirty-three flats which remained more or less intact. There being no central heating system, the council provided the occupiers with individual means of heating water by gas geysers in each flat. These requisitions are still in force. After the war the demolished portion of the building was re-built, under a cost of works payment, in 1946 or 1947. The property was then in the hands of a receiver and manager appointed by a building society as debenture holders and to him fell the duty of letting the new flats. At that time there had recently been passed the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, which set up rent tribunals having the right, in any case where a contract existed between lessor and lessee in which the rent included payment for services, to review that rent. These tribunals were regarded with extreme disfavour by landlords, and, accordingly, when the receiver was minded to let the flats, he sought about for a device whereby, notwithstanding that the landlords were intending to provide various services including hot water (the boiler house having been re-built at a considerable expense), the contracts should be kept out of the clutches of the rent tribunals. Accordingly, in the agreement into which the receiver entered in respect of each and every of the twenty-two newly built flats, there is an extraordinary clause providing that the landlords undertake no obligations for any services and stating that, if the landlords find it convenient to furnish any services, that shall merely be an act of grace on their part. The agreements were for a term of three years ending Christmas, 1950, and contain the following covenants:

"4. The tenant agrees that he . . . will not without written consent of the landlord make any alteration in or addition to the said premises whatsoever nor erect any stove or pipe or do anything to increase the rate of premium of insurance."

It may be thought that no sensible tenant would enter into such an agreement, but the persons with whom the receiver contracted were speculators who had no intention of living in the flats, and, in fact, the agreements were made before the flats were habitable. These speculators, however, succeeded in every case in assigning the agreements to persons badly in want of a roof over their heads and who apparently did not much mind what terms they accepted if they could get one. The five defendants are in this class. In 1948 the plaintiffs acquired the freehold from the receiver.

In 1949 there was passed the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, which brought these flats under the jurisdiction of the rent tribunals, and in autumn, 1949, seventeen of the twenty-two tenants promptly applied to the tribunal to have their rents reduced. Confronted with these applications, the landlords did not withdraw the services which they were voluntarily providing, but went before the tribunal, which on Mar. 23, 1950, reduced all the rents on the basis that the landlords were under no contractual obligation to provide any services. The obvious retort by the landlords to the tenants' action, and one which they should have foreseen, was to withdraw all services. Immediately after the tribunal's decision there was a meeting between the landlords and their solicitors and certain of the tenants who called themselves a tenants' committee, and there was a long discussion about the future. The landlords put forward proposals for the continuance of the various services, notably the hot water and the radiator heating, and produced figures which purported to show that the cost of doing so amounted to £80 or more for each of the twenty-two flats. I do not think these figures were justified, but that is immaterial. The fact remains that this building was designed as one unit comprising fifty-six flats, all provided with services at a reasonable cost to each tenant, but, as thirty-three of the flats are requisitioned and the tenants neither accept nor pay for services, the whole economy of the block is thrown out of gear and the cost to the landlords of supplying even hot water and radiator heating alone to twenty-two tenants is out of all proportion to what it is reasonable to ask a tenant to pay. The result is that all the elements of a stalemate exist, for the landlords cannot be called harsh or unreasonable for not providing services for which they are under no obligation at less than cost, while it is natural that the tenants will not accept services more costly to them than in reason they should be.

At the meeting above mentioned the landlords offered to provide the services for £60 a flat, and this offer was indignantly rejected by the so-called committee. As a result, on Mar. 30, 1950, the boilers were put out and provision of hot water ceased. There arose at once the question whether the tenants should provide their own hot water. This matter had, in fact, been mooted at the meeting, when it was pointed out that under the terms of the lease, according to the landlords' view of it, the installation of hot water systems would constitute alterations which could not be made without their leave. They said that they would not unreasonably withhold permission, but must have from each tenant full details of any proposed alterations before work was started. On Mar. 27 a letter containing words to this effect was sent to every tenant. Thereafter the matter pursued a course which differed slightly in the case of each defendant though much of the ground is common to them all. I will take as typical the case of the defendant Jones. This tenant, on Apr. 12, 1950, applied for permission to instal a gas geyser similar to those in the requisitioned flats. He also promised to restore the property when the installation was removed. Similar applications were made by other tenants, and by Apr. 14 twelve of them had asked leave to instal some kind of water heater. On that date a further circular was sent to every tenant offering to supply the services for £50 a flat and stating that alterations necessary to instal individual water heating would be authorised subject to a condition of reinstatement and to a sufficient deposit to ensure the cost of it. The landlords also asked for a specification of the work proposed and an undertaking to pay their costs. There was obviously nothing unreasonable in these terms.

On May 18 the landlords withdrew their offer and sent out another circular in which the relevant covenant in the lease is set out. This circular was a wordy document and was accompanied by a form of application, on the signature of which the landlords insisted before alterations could be allowed. They also stipulated that a sufficient majority of the tenants should apply. The document accompanying this letter was severely criticised at the hearing, and, no doubt, it is capable of improvement and simplification, but, in my judgment, it contains substantially nothing which a landlord might not reasonably require in the circumstances. In June, 1950, Mr. Jones consulted Messrs. Bird & Bird, the solicitors now representing the defendants, on his own behalf and on behalf of ten other tenants, including his co-defendants, and on June 9, that firm wrote the following letter:

"Dear Sirs, Hartington Court. We are acting for Mr. G. W. Jones and for ten other tenants of Hartington Court in connection with negotiations which have taken place arising out of the provision of services to the flats and particularly over the supply of hot water. Our clients now desire to instal gas or electric water heaters of approved design, full details of which we are prepared to furnish together with proper specifications covering the work involved. We are also prepared to pay your legal expenses properly incurred in respect of the necessary licences or consents, plus reasonable damages (if any) for the diminution in the value of the premises and to give an undertaking to reinstate on departure. If this proposal is unacceptable to you, our clients intend to pursue the matter further, and to take advantage of such legal remedies as may be open to them. In the circumstances we would appreciate a statement of your clients' present attitude on this question."

To this the landlords' solicitors replied that the landlords were willing to give their consent in the terms of the circular letter of May 18, and the application form accompanying it. At this point there is a delay of two months on the tenants' side and then, on Aug. 25, a letter is written on Mr. Jones' behalf treating the proposed installation as possibly an alteration but as being an improvement and asking for a licence on that footing. An answer to this letter was required within fourteen days (and this after two months' delay and in the holiday season), and it was intimated that at the end of the fourteen days Mr. Jones would treat consent as unreasonably withheld and proceed with his alterations. In fact, he did not wait even for fourteen days, but on Sept. 7 placed an order for a gas heater, the work on which was started on Sept. 12. The other four defendants wrote letters somewhat similar to that written by Messrs. Bird & Bird for Mr. Jones on Aug. 25 and obviously adapted from that letter, and in each case they followed it up at a less or a greater interval by ordering similar installations to be made. All the installations were complete by Oct. 21. The landlords on Oct. 3, unaware that most of the installations had been ordered by then, modified to some extent the form sent out by them on May 18 and still asked every defendant to sign it as modified. Each of them refused. Towards the end of October the landlords caused an inspection to be made of the property which disclosed the facts, and on Nov. 16 they wrote to Messrs. Bird & Bird complaining that no permission had been given. Even at this point the landlords were willing to waive the breach which they alleged on the signature by the tenants of a supplemental agreement in a form which they enclosed, but none of the defendants would agree, and these actions were started in January, 1951. At the time when the heaters were installed in September or October, 1950, these tenancy agreements had no longer to run than the end of the quarter, and although this was ignored on both sides, because nowadays tenants hold over under statutory protection and, therefore, forget the length of their tenancies, it remains important when considering a question between landlord and tenant. The rateable value of each flat brought it within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. The installation of gas water heaters did, in my opinion, clearly constitute an alteration and also constituted the erection of pipes within the mischief of cl. 4 of the leases. Thus the landlords had, subject to what is next stated, an absolute right to withhold consent, and a breach of covenant was in each case committed.

By the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 19 (2), a covenant against the making of improvements without licence must be read subject to a proviso that a licence is not to be unreasonably withheld. It is settled law that this sub-section covers a covenant against doing something which is an alteration if it be, in fact, an improvement (see Lambert v. F. W. Woolworth & Co., Ltd. (1)) and that the question whether it is so must be looked at from the point of view of the tenant: see pre LUXMOORE, J. ([1931] 2 Ch. 331) in Balls Bros., Ltd. v. Sinclair (2), which was approved by LORD WRIGHT, M.R. ([1936] 2 All E.R. 1533) in F. W. Woolworth & Co., Ltd. v. Lambert (3). Access to the flats is obtained by passages in the form of balconies running along the outside of the building. In my judgment, these balconies are not included in the demise to a tenant in the tenancy agreements but remain the property of the landlords. The fumes from the gas heaters are carried out of the flats by flue pipes fixed in each case to the underside of the balcony of the storey above and ending in an unsightly baffle protruding beyond the balcony. This appears to be an essential feature. Were, then, these gas heaters "improvements" within the meaning of s. 19 (2) of the Act of 1927? On the one hand, it was submitted (a) that the flats were not intended to have their water heated in this way, but contained a built-in system of pipes for supplying hot water from a central boiler and that anything else was a mere makeshift, and (b) that the baffles which I have described ruined the appearance of the building. This objection would have great force if the baffles stuck out in the front of the building, but they stick out at the back where each of the thirty-three requisitioned flats has a similar installation, and in those circumstances the addition of a score more seems to me not to deteriorate considerably the amenities of the place. It was argued, on the other side, that these installations must be improvements from the tenants' point of view because a flat with hot water must be an improvement on a flat without it. If the landlords had been in a position to offer a supply of hot water at a reasonable cost, I should have been prepared to hold that these could not have been improvements, but the position is different where the landlords, for the reasons before stated, were not in a position to supply this service except at an excessive cost. Apart from this, the present landlords have inherited these tenancy agreements which are in such a form as to give them no right to supply or charge for any water heating. In the circumstances, I should be prepared to hold that these were improvements but for one fact, and that is that each of them is not confined to the demised premises but depends on the existence of a flue pipe which is fastened to, and is, therefore, a trespass on, the landlords' property. I do not see how that can be an improvement to demised premises which necessarily extends beyond them and trespasses on the property of the landlords who are not obliged to afford support for these flues from their property. Without them, I understand, the installations are not practicable. On this footing, s. 19 (2) does not apply. The landlords had an absolute right to withhold their consent and each installation was a breach of covenant which remained unremedied when the tenancy agreements expired.

I must, however, further consider the matter on the footing that I am wrong in the view last taken, that these alterations do constitute improvements within the meaning of s. 19 (2) of the Act of 1927, and that, therefore, consent to them must not be unreasonably withheld. I take it that the landlords have withheld their consent by the mere act of issuing the writs in these actions. Have they, then, been unreasonable? In the first place, it seems to me again important to emphasise that these were short tenancies. The landlords had no assurance that any tenant would stay beyond Christmas, 1950, and this fact, in my judgment, entitled them, if they were to assent to alterations of the property to this degree, to take every step to protect themselves against expense if and when the tenant should vacate. The landlords, though conceiving themselves entitled to refuse their assent unconditionally, never did so, and the question which I have to decide is whether the conditions which they imposed on the giving of licences were such as they might reasonably impose in the circumstances. In my judgment, on the facts, even if the installations were improvements, the landlords have not unreasonably withheld their consent to their installation, with the result that the tenants were not justified in doing what they did and had before the end of the contractual tenancy in each case committed a breach of a covenant in the lease which would justify a claim for forfeiture after service of the proper notice under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (1). No such notices, however, were sent out and all the tenancies expired at Christmas, 1950, and it is, perhaps, the fundamental question in the action whether after that date the tenants held over as statutory tenants or whether they became mere trespassers, in which case there is no answer to the landlords' claim.

In my judgment, each tenant on Dec. 26, by holding over, acquired what is popularly known as a statutory tenancy. This, of course, is not a tenancy though conveniently so called. It is a mere status of irremovability. The landlords argue that this status is not acquired by a tenant who during his contractual tenancy has committed such a breach as would entitle his landlord to forfeit the lease, but I can find no basis for this proposition, reasonable though it may sound. The landlords served no notice to remedy the breach before the expiration of the tenancies and were, therefore, not in a position to forfeit the leases before they expired, and I can see no reason why in those circumstances statutory tenancies did not arise at Christmas, 1950, in favour of each tenant who held over. Whether the same would be true if notices had been served I need not decide, though I think it would. If writs for possession had been issued before Christmas, 1950, thus conditionally avoiding the leases, the position might have been different, though, even so, it would have been arguable that statutory tenancies arose: see the observation of ASQUITH, L.J. ([1951] 2 K.B. 73), in Court v. Robinson (4). No doubt, a tenant in such a position might expect to get short shrift when the court was asked to say that it was reasonable that the landlord should not have possession, at any rate in a case where the breach was such that relief against forfeiture would not have been granted under the Law of Property Act, 1925, but the question would still, in my judgment, be whether it was reasonable to give possession, within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), and sched. I, para. (a).

There remains, therefore, the question whether it would be reasonable to make orders for possession, or, at least, to make it a term of withholding that order that the offending installations should be removed. It has been said that cases where possession should be refused, if the breach complained of is not remedied, are rare: see per MORTON, L.J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 550) in Bell London & Provincial Properties, Ltd. v. Reuben (5). This, of course, I accept. None the less, I am of opinion that it would not be reasonable in the circumstances to make orders for possession, here, nor to insist on the removal of the heaters as a condition of withholding the orders. I am far from condoning the actions of the defendants, who, in my view, were quite unjustified in attempting to flout the landlords and dictate their own terms for occupying what is, after all, the landlords' property. It remains the fact that the thirty-three requisitioned flats all have heating systems of this sort and that the landlords themselves have granted certain licences to other tenants for similar installations and were always, before writ issued, willing, even after the breaches were known to them, to do

A the same for the defendants. The question, therefore, seems to me to be on what terms I ought to allow the defendants to remain in possession and maintain their installations. In my judgment, it should be on the terms that each of them signs a document substantially in the form of cl. (a) to cl. (g) of the draft agreement accompanying the landlords' letter to Messrs. Bird & Bird of Nov. 16, 1950. It may be that some alterations are desirable or necessary and I propose to give the parties an opportunity of agreeing the terms. If they cannot do that, the document will be settled by conveyancing counsel to the court. It should give to the landlords all the protection for which s. 19 (2) of the Act of 1927 provides and, in particular, (a) the payment of a proper sum towards the landlords' costs (this seems to have been agreed at four guineas) and (b) the deposit of a proper sum to pay for the reinstatement of each flat after removing the heaters (the evidence on this seems to have arrived at a sum of about five guineas). It seems also to be now agreed that this type of installation does not interfere with the functioning of the central system so that it should be made clear that no tenant is obliged to revert to that if the landlords agree with the other tenants or a majority of them to restore it. If any of the defendants fails to sign the agreement within twenty-one days of the date when its terms are agreed or settled, an order for possession will go against him. I am conscious that the terms which I impose involve the continuance of the trespass committed by each defendant in causing the flue to be affixed to the landlords' property, but, as I can give or withhold possession at my discretion, I conceive it to be within my jurisdiction to impose this condition on the landlords as part of the terms on which I refuse possession.

D There remains the important question of costs. The actions are analogous to actions for possession by lessors against lessees where the breach is proved but the lessee obtains by counterclaim relief against forfeiture which he may have (though this is unusual) without remedying the breach: see, for example, House Property & Investment Co., Ltd. v. James Walker (Goldsmith & Silversmith), Ltd. (6). In such cases the ordinary course is to direct the tenant as one of the terms of obtaining relief to pay the costs of action and counterclaim, and this is the course I should be disposed to take if free to do so. The present actions, until the statements of claim were amended at the hearing, were framed as though contractual tenancies existed and had been forfeited by notice under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (1). This, of course, was a misconception, for the tenancies had expired before writ and the defendants were either mere trespassers or statutory tenants. I have held them to be the latter. The actions were, therefore, claims for possession against statutory tenants on the ground that a breach had been committed of the contractual terms imported into each statutory tenancy by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 15 (1), and that it was reasonable that the court should make orders for possession, and it is on that footing that I have decided the cases. The claims in trespass I ignore, for they are technical. Have I, then, jurisdiction to impose on the tenants, as a term of allowing them to retain possession, the obligation to pay the landlords' costs? In my judgment, I am precluded from doing so by s. 17 (2) of the Act of 1920, which forbids the granting to a plaintiff of High Court costs in a case "arising out of this Act." These words have been much debated, but it seems to me that the point is decided in favour of the tenants by the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Russoff v. Lipovitch (7) and Lee v. K. Carter, Ltd. (8). It is true that here the landlords claimed throughout that the tenants were not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, but that claim I have rejected, holding that the only justification of the claims to possession lies in satisfying the conditions laid down in s. 3 (1) and sched. I of the Act of 1933. Accordingly, I find myself precluded from awarding the landlords any costs. As to the tenants, they deserve none, in my judgment, for they could have had the terms which I have accorded to them without any action and the proceedings stem from their unreasonable attitude.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Forsythe, Kerman & Phillips (for the landlords); Bird & Bird (for the tenants).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

A

Re 42-48 PADDINGTON STREET AND 62-72 CHILTERN STREET, ST. MARYLEBONE. MARKS & SPENCER, LTD. v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.), B
March 27, 31, April 1, 1952.]

Town and Country Planning—"Works for the erection of a building"—Clearance of site—Erection of new building not begun—Separate contracts for clearance and building—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 78 (1).

Town and Country Planning—Interim development—Conditional permission—Limitation of time for commencement and completion of work—No reason given for imposing condition—Validity of condition—Town and Country Planning Act, 1932 (c. 48), s. 10 (3). C

In August, 1937, the plaintiffs entered into a building agreement with P.E., under which, on the completion of agreed buildings on a certain site, the plaintiffs would become entitled to a lease of the premises for ninety years at an agreed rent. It was provided that the demolition of the existing buildings on the site must be started by mid-summer, 1938, and that the erection of the new buildings be completed by Christmas, 1939. The time limits were, however, in fact extended beyond the date of these proceedings. By August, 1938, all consents to the building scheme under the London Building Act, 1930, the Restriction of Ribbon Development Act, 1935, and the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933, had been obtained. The permission granted to the plaintiffs under the interim development order was dated Aug. 9, 1938, and was subject to a number of conditions of which the first was that the work should be commenced within six months and completed within eighteen months of Aug. 1, 1938, "failing which the consent shall become null and void". Plans for the new buildings were approved, and on June 9, 1939, the plaintiffs entered into a written contract with contractors for the demolition of the existing buildings, which was completed by Aug. 2, 1939. At that time war with Germany was regarded as imminent and no contract for the new buildings was entered into, and during the war the building project remained in abeyance. Execution of the scheme was resumed in November, 1948, when the plaintiffs gave notice to the London County Council of their intention to proceed. The council refused to sanction the development of the site, and the Central Land Board refused the plaintiffs' claim to exemption from development charge. The plaintiffs claimed that planning permission must be deemed to be granted to them by virtue of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 78 (1). D E F G

HELD: (i) (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., dissentiente) the words "works for the erection or alteration of a building" in s. 78 (1) included operations which were not in themselves building operations; it was sufficient for the sub-section to apply if operations had been carried out which were part of the totality of operations necessary on the relevant site for the purpose of carrying to completion a particular building project; in carrying out the demolition the plaintiffs had begun works for the erection of a building; H

(ii) the condition relating to time was not expressly or by necessary implication outside the purview of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 10 (3), and, therefore, was not ultra vires, but the London County Council (the specified authority within s. 10 (3)) was bound by that subsection on its true construction to give reasons for the council's decision to grant permission subject to conditions; such reasons not having been given, the council must be deemed to have granted permission unconditionally; and, accordingly, the plaintiffs' works could, immediately before the appointed day (July 1, 1948), "have been completed . . . in accordance with permission granted" by or under an interim development order" within s. 78 (1) of the Act of 1947;

(iii) therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to the protection of that sub-section.

Decision of HARMAN, J. ([1951] 2 All E.R. 1025), reversed.

FOR THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1947, s. 78, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 25, p. 590.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs, Marks & Spencer, Ltd., from an order of HARMAN, J., dated Dec. 4, 1951, and reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 1025.

The plaintiffs issued an originating summons to determine, inter alia, whether, on the true construction of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 78, the plaintiffs had not before the appointed day (July 1, 1948) begun, but not completed, works for the erection of a building on a certain site, and (ii) whether, on the true construction of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 10 (3), and the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933, the plaintiffs immediately before the appointed day had valid permission to complete the said works.

Capewell, Q.C., J. R. Willis and V. M. C. Pennington for the plaintiffs.

Lawrence, Q.C., and H. E. Francis for the first defendants, the London County Council.

Denys B. Buckley for the Central Land Board.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: This is an appeal from a judgment of HARMAN, J., on an originating summons raising, in effect, the question whether the plaintiffs, Messrs. Marks & Spencer, Ltd., are entitled to proceed with certain building operations on land of which they are lessees in St. Marylebone, without the consent of the first defendants, the London County Council, as the planning authority for that area within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and without paying any development charge to the second defendants, the Central Land Board, in accordance with the terms of that Act. This the plaintiffs can do if they bring themselves, but only if they bring themselves, within the scope of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 78. The learned judge has concluded the matter against the plaintiffs.

The facts are not in dispute. They are fully dealt with in the judgment of HARMAN, J., and I need not, therefore, repeat them at length. The following summary will, I hope, suffice. The freehold of, or the reversion to the plaintiffs' interest in, this land is vested in the Portman estate, and in August, 1937, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with the Portman estate which involved the plaintiffs in taking down a number of existing buildings and erecting a large edifice which was to be used by the plaintiffs for offices in connection with their business. By this agreement these operations had to be completed by the end of 1939, but the time has been extended, and as between the Portman estate and the plaintiffs the plaintiffs are not now in default on that ground. But the plaintiffs do, of course, remain liable to the Portman estate under their agreement to perform the operations which were agreed between them, and they are paying in respect of the land a substantial rent.

The time when this agreement was made and the other matters which I am about to relate occurred was, nationally speaking, an anxious period. It was shortly before the outbreak of the second world war. In the spring of 1938 the plaintiffs invited tenders for the work which they had agreed with the Portman estate to undertake, and a number of tenders was put in. The plaintiffs were not satisfied that the prices charged in these tenders were such as they ought to pay, and they accepted none of them. They decided in fact, for the purpose of performing their obligations, to sever the work which had to be done into two separate sections. As regards the second—i.e., the erection of the new office structure—they decided that they would engage the services of a well-known firm of building contractors, Bovis, Ltd., with whom they had had previous business transactions and had agreed a form of building contract which was described by the judge as a kind of cost-plus contract and was thought by the plaintiffs to be the most satisfactory. It followed that they would have to employ some other contractors to do the first necessary operation of taking down the existing buildings and preparing the site for the erection of the new.

On June 16, 1938, Mr. Bennett, the agent for the plaintiffs, applied to the London County Council under the then Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, and the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933 (S.R. & O., 1933, No. 236), for the permission of the council, as planning authority, for this building which it was proposed to erect. As I follow it, however, this application related exclusively to the erection, on a site assumed to be cleared, of the new office building illustrated in the plans submitted. The permission which the plaintiffs sought was granted on Aug. 9, 1938, subject to certain conditions. As I have referred to it at this stage, it may be convenient that I should read the first of a number of conditions, because a good deal of the later part of the argument turns on it. The form which this letter of Aug. 9, 1938, took was :

“ With reference to Mr. Bennett’s application dated June 16, 1938, I am directed to inform you that the council, in pursuance of its powers under the above-named order, hereby permits the erection of a building at the premises known as [they are then defined] in accordance with plans . . . submitted subject to (1) The work being commenced within six months and completed within eighteen months from Aug. 1, 1938, failing which the consent shall become null and void . . . ”

There then follow five more conditions, and the writer, the clerk to the council, is also directed to add that the permission is given subject to certain other matters which are specified on the second page. At the date of that document, Aug. 9, 1938, there did not exist any contracts with either Bovis, Ltd. or with any firm of demolition contractors for doing the whole of the operation which the plaintiffs had, by agreement with Portman estate, undertaken to perform. But in the following year, 1939, a contract was made with a firm of the name of Boyer, who were demolition contractors, to do the essential preliminary work of taking down the existing buildings, clearing and preparing the site, including the basement of the existing buildings (or the excavations which formed part of the existing building) which was to be incorporated in the new structure to be erected. Those demolition works, clearing the site, and so forth, had been completed, as I understand, by the end of July, 1939. To all of us, of course, that date brings back the recollection of a time of the utmost anxiety, and it is not, therefore, at all surprising that nothing further was done in the way of starting the work of erection or even of making a contract with Bovis, Ltd., or with any other person for that purpose. Indeed, the site was occupied then and thereafter in connection with the formation, in preparation for the forthcoming conflict, of fire-fighting units. There the matter remained until the war was fought and won, and until the plaintiffs resuscitated the question they had taken up so long before with the London County Council by inquiring whether they might now be taken as entitled to proceed with the building proposed on the faith of the permission given, notwithstanding that the first condition in the letter of Aug. 9, 1938, on the face of it showed that, the time limit having long since expired, the consent under the Act of 1932 and the order of 1933 had become null and void.

I have said that in the period of the war and the immediately post-war period nothing was in fact done by the plaintiffs, either by way of physical work in making the new building or in making a contract with somebody else so to do, but it is proved quite clearly, and the judge finds as a fact, that the plaintiffs never at any time abandoned their firm intention to build this new structure. Indeed, they could not very well do anything else because they were under contract with their landlords, the Portman estate, so to do. It is, therefore, clear that the demolition work that was done in the summer of 1939 was done with a view, and solely with a view, to the erection of the building that they had promised the Portman estate to erect, which building was illustrated on the plans, and which plans, in turn, had been submitted to the London County Council as the basis for the granting by them of their planning permission.

So far as the duties of planning authorities are concerned, the matter is now governed by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The broad scheme of that Act (which differs in certain material respects from its predecessor in 1932) is to be found in Part III, so far as relevant to this case, and the first material section, s. 12, provides by sub-s. (1):

“Subject to the provisions of this section and to the following provisions of this Act, permission shall be required under this Part of this Act in respect of any development of land which is carried out after the appointed day.”

I interpolate that the appointed day for the purposes of this Act was July 1, 1948. Then sub-s. (2) gives a wide definition of the word “development” thus:

“In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires, the expression ‘development’ means the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land.”

It has been a question debated before us whether the three words “or other operations” in the circumstances include demolition. It does not seem to me to matter whether that formula does or does not include demolition. But it is the broad scheme of the Act, that for “any work” (which would plainly include the putting up of the new building proposed by the plaintiffs after July 1, 1948) permission is required under Part III subject to the other provisions of the Act which may operate to exempt any particular case.

The case of the plaintiffs, as I have already indicated, is that they are within the exemption of s. 78 (1) which provides:

“Subject to the provisions of this section, where any works for the erection or alteration of a building have been begun but not completed before the appointed day [July 1, 1948] then if immediately before that day those works could have been completed in conformity . . . with permission granted by or under an interim development order . . . planning permission shall, by virtue of this section, be deemed to be granted under Part III of this Act in respect of the completion of those works.”

The permission which is contained in the letter of Aug. 9, 1938, was indubitably a permission granted under an interim development order. It states on the face of it that it is given under the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933. If, therefore, the plaintiffs can satisfy, first, the condition that there were existing “works for the erection of a building begun but not completed before” July 1, 1948, and, further, if it can be shown that those works could have been completed immediately before July 1, 1948, by virtue of the permission contained in the letter of Aug. 9, 1938, then the plaintiffs are deemed to have permission under Part III in respect of such completion, i.e., the completion (to use the words of the sub-section) of "those works". It is, therefore, a case in which there are two fences which the plaintiffs must surmount, and I may say that it was the view of HARMAN, J., that they failed at each.

I must now turn to the first question, which has seemed to me to be a matter of great difficulty—whether the first condition is satisfied that there were here works for the erection of a building begun but incomplete on July 1, 1948. As regards that matter HARMAN, J., said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 1028):

"In my judgment, it is really a question of fact whether, at the critical date, works for the erection of a building had been begun, but were not finished on the site. It was agreed before me that 'works', by reason of the use of the plural, must connote physical operations on the site. It is clear that the erection of a building need not have been begun, because otherwise no meaning would have been given to the words 'works for'. It seems to me that, if there had been here a building contract which involved the demolition of the old buildings before the erection of the new, it might well have been possible to say that, though the performance of the contract had proceeded no further than the demolition of the old buildings, that was, nevertheless, works for the erection of the new. This is not that case. Here the demolition contract stands alone, the contractors' work was finished and no further contract ever came into existence. In my judgment, it is not possible to say that the site as it was on the appointed day contained works for the erection of a new building. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs fail."

The argument of the plaintiffs is that they have satisfied this formula because, say they, they began in 1939 an operation which consisted of works for the erection of a new building. They began by demolishing the old building, but the works, taken as a whole, were not completed because they had not gone on to the erection of the new building for which the demolition was preparatory. Against this, it is said on the other side that demolition works, though, no doubt, preparatory to works of erection, were in this case wholly distinct in themselves and began and ended years before July, 1948, without any start at all having been made on any new building. In that regard, there is no doubt that HARMAN, J., was much influenced by the absence of a building contract; he appears to have placed emphasis on it in the passage I have read. Counsel for the London County Council before us has not so much emphasised that particular aspect. His argument, shortly, is that if one reads the whole of s. 78 (1) the phrase "works for the erection of a building" is the same subject-matter as "those works", which is the phrase found later; that "those works" must have the quality that they are the subject of a permission granted; and that since here the demolition works were not so subject and were only connected with the proposed erection in the minds of the plaintiffs, therefore, the formula is not satisfied and the plaintiffs, as the learned judge held, must fail.

Whatever is the position under the Act of 1947—and counsel for the plaintiffs in his reply has suggested that works of demolition are within the meaning of the word "works" at any rate for many purposes of that Act—it is, as I understand, clear that under the Act of 1932, save in the case of buildings scheduled as being of special interest or of works comprised within s. 44, demolition, as such, is an operation which did not require any permission from the planning authority. A man might demolish buildings without any decision having been made by him at the time how afterwards he would seek to use the land, and in that case he would require no permission and the demolition of itself could not fairly in that case be said to be part of the totality of an operation which necessarily comprehended the erection of a building. The demolition clearly could not in that case, I should have thought, be "works for the erection of a building". I also have no doubt that in ordinary parlance and among those who are engaged in the trade of contractor, whether a building contractor or a demolition contractor, the word "works" in the plural is one of common currency, and will or may certainly include works of demolition, excavation and the like. Indeed, in opening his case before us counsel for the plaintiffs put it that the word "works" can be and should be construed, where you find it in these Acts, according to the context in which it from time to time appears. But after looking at the relevant sections in both Acts, including definitions, I am bound to say that in their context here the words "works for the erection" do not strike me as prima facie intended to include works of demolition. The point is obviously a narrow one, and, although on this matter I regret to find that my own conclusion is not shared by either of my brethren, I am, for my part, of opinion that the argument of counsel for the London County Council is correct, and that on this part of the case the learned judge's conclusion ought to be sustained.

I think there are two ways in which the matter may be tested. The first is the way I ventured to put it to counsel for the plaintiffs during his reply. If (as it is said by him) there were on July 1, 1948, works for the erection of a building begun but not completed, then what were they? I took a note of his answer, and he said they were the demolition, the clearing of the basement so as to be incorporated in the new building, the erection of hoardings and a gate, and the preparation for building a new building—i.e., the approval of the plan, plus the intention to build, and the contract to build. I am bound to say that I cannot for my part bring that concatenation of things all within the phrase "works for the erection of a building", and it seems to me to resile from what has been said and accepted below, that "works" must be physical operations carried out on the land. JENKINS, L.J., suggested that a more prudent answer would be, "the totality of the operations to be carried out on the site as defined in the building agreement". I will assume that it was true to say, on July 1, 1948, and could have been said many years before, that under the agreement with the Portman estate the plaintiffs were bound to carry out certain specified building operations on the site which would terminate in the appearance on the site of the new edifice which is illustrated on the plans, and if it can be said that those operations had been begun and not completed, then it may well be that the answer is as counsel suggested it should be. But I am not satisfied that, for the purpose of construing this section, one is entitled to take into account the fact that the plaintiffs, the building owners, had made some arrangement or contract with a third party to erect a particular building. If that is right, then it would appear to me to follow that if the plaintiffs could establish that they had made up their minds, apart from any obligation by contract, to erect a particular building, it could equally be said that the demolition works were part of those total operations though the total operations were merely, so to speak, in the minds of the plaintiffs. It may or may not be that demolition is something which requires permission under the new Act and did not under the old. I can well understand that plans put forward for approval may on the face of them show and include the demolition to be done as part of the total operation, even though for the demolition taken by itself no planning permission would be required. Thus, to take the alternative in the sub-section of "works for the alteration of a building", there would, I take it, appear on the plans submitted what had first to be taken down in order that the altered thing might be put in its place, and in all those cases I think it would be right to say that the first stages, which consisted of the destructive part of the work, were part of the "works for the erection or alteration of a building". I also agree that the formula "works for the building" must have a wider significance than would be covered by the words "works of building", but that does not, in my judgment, suffice for the facts of the present case.

What I have said is, perhaps, putting in another way (and it may be not put so well) the main argument put by counsel for the London County Council, which is to the effect that, if one reads the sub-section as a whole, the "works for the erection of a building" are "those works which could have been completed in conformity with the planning permission", and when in this case one asks what those works were and one looks accordingly at the permission given under the Act and order, one finds that the only works for which permission was given were works for the erection of a new building independently of (though, no doubt, based on the assumption of) a previous clearing of the site, and of those works, as distinct from the first clearing operation, there is not any doubt that they had not been begun at the material date. As I have indicated, I think that the question is one, perhaps, in large degree of first impression, and when I come back and ask the question: What in the present case were "works for the erection . . . but not completed before July 1, 1948"? I am not satisfied that an answer can be given by the plaintiffs which is satisfactory and entitles them to say they are within the ambit of the protection.

I should, therefore, on that ground dismiss this appeal, but, as I have said, my brothers take a different view, and in the circumstances I must pass, though I shall deal with it briefly, to the second hurdle with which the plaintiffs are confronted. It is this: Assuming that these are "works", then are the plaintiffs now entitled to complete them by virtue of this planning permission given on Aug. 9, 1938? I have already stated that on the face of the letter the answer would be in the negative because, the work not having been completed within eighteen months from Aug. 1, 1938, the consent is expressed to have become null and void. But the first point taken by counsel for the plaintiffs is that this condition which I have read is wholly void and ineffective, because there is no power in the planning authority to impose a condition as to time. The learned judge rejected that view, and I reject it also, on the simple ground that I find nothing in the relevant terms of the relevant Act to limit the conditions which may be imposed so as to exclude conditions of time. The relevant part of the relevant Act is s. 10 (3) of the Act of 1932:

"Where an application for permission to develop land is made to the specified authority in manner provided by the order, the authority may, subject to the terms of the order, grant the application unconditionally or subject to such conditions as they think proper to impose, or may refuse the application . . ."

I can find nothing in that context, or anywhere else in the Act—for instance, in para. 19 of sched. II, to which we were referred—which would entitle the court to say that the words "subject to such conditions as they think proper to impose" must be read with the qualification "provided that they are not conditions as to time". I, therefore, reject that part of the answer.

The second matter raised by counsel for the plaintiffs has been much more difficult, though it turns again, I think, as did the first point, very much on a first impression of the language used. The argument used is that by the effect of s. 10 (3) of the Act of 1932, which I have partly read, and to which can be joined the terms of the order of 1933, no condition can be validly imposed unless reasons for its imposition are given. The effect, therefore, if that argument is right, is either that under the terms of the rest of the sub-section (which I will read in a moment) the London County Council is to be deemed to have granted an unconditional permission, or one is entitled to treat this permission granted on Aug. 9 as unembarrassed by the conditions which were invalidly added to it. The language of s. 10 (3) refers to the terms of the order, and that order is the one mentioned in s. 10 (1):

"The Minister shall make a general order with respect to the interim development of land . . ."

The Minister did make a general order in 1933, to which I have already alluded. Section 10 (3), after the part which I have already read, continues as follows:

"... and they [the planning authority] shall be deemed to have granted the application unconditionally unless within two months from the receipt thereof, or within such longer period as the applicant may agree in writing to allow, they give notice to him that they have decided to the contrary, stating their reasons for so doing."

If it is permissible to have regard to the order, the matter appears to be made tolerably plain, because art. 10 of the order of 1933 is:

"The grant or refusal of permission by the interim development authority for development to proceed shall be in writing and, where the authority decide to grant permission subject to conditions, or to refuse permission, the reasons for their decision shall be stated in writing."

It is, therefore, beyond doubt that the terms of the order state that a conditional grant of permission shall contain in writing the reasons for the conditions imposed or at least for the imposition of conditions. Counsel for the London County Council said that the order cannot have the effect of increasing the obligations imposed by Parliament on the authority. I am not quite sure that that is right, because s. 10 (1), as I have said, requires the Minister to make a general order with respect to interim development, and s. 10 (3) provides that where an application for development is made "the authority may, subject to the terms of the order, grant the application", etc.

Assuming in counsel's favour that the matter does depend, and depends exclusively, on the terms of s. 10 (3) itself, then the question revolves round the simple question what is meant by the phrase "they have decided to the contrary". To the contrary of what? That is the problem. It is not, I am bound to say, a happy piece of phrasing, and it has led to long arguments and many suggestions as to what might be meant by those words "to the contrary". If it means they have decided not to grant, unconditionally, an application, then, presumably, a decision to grant a conditional permission would be "to the contrary". Counsel for the London County Council suggested that "to the contrary" in its context really means that they have decided to refuse permission altogether. I have on the whole been unable to accept that view. I do so with some regret because I must say that it seems to me extraordinary that the authority is required to give reasons for every condition that they impose, even though the reason for the imposition of the condition is absolutely obvious. Thus, to take the example given by JENKINS, L.J., if permission is granted subject to there being a proper fire escape provided, it seems absurd that the authority must say: "The reason for this condition is so that people should be able to escape from the building in case of fire." However, the question is: What is the true interpretation of the words used? There is no doubt that at the back of it lies this important consideration, that there is given to the applicant an opportunity, if he feels aggrieved, of going by way of appeal to the Minister. I turn, accordingly, to s. 10 (5) of the Act of 1932, which seems to me to contain within it the answer to this problem. Section 10 (5) provides:

"An applicant who is aggrieved by the refusal of the authority to consent to his application, or by any conditions imposed by them, may within twenty-eight days from the date on which he received notice of the decision of the authority, or such longer period as the Minister may allow, appeal to the Minister..."

Three possibilities are envisaged in s. 10 (3), viz., unconditional permission, absolute refusal, or permission subject to conditions. When one turns to s. 10 (5), it is dealing indifferently with the second and the third. It deals with the case of absolute refusal and also with permission subject to conditions. Both those are spoken of as "decisions" of the authority, which refers one back, I think, to the "decision" mentioned at the end of s. 10 (3), where the language is "give notice... that they have decided to the contrary". If that be right, it must follow, I think, necessarily that a decision "to the contrary" comprehends a decision to grant permission subject to conditions. If that is so, this matter must be, I think, decided in the plaintiffs' favour. I add that, although it is easy to see cases (I have given an example) where it seems supererogatory to have to give reasons in writing, I can also see that it would be difficult for an applicant who is aggrieved to put his case or even to give satisfactory reasons for his dissatisfaction unless he was given reasons by the planning authority why they have imposed a particular condition. If an appellant appeals against the imposition of a condition without knowing why it is imposed, it is obvious that he might be faced on appeal with an explanation by the planning authority which would make it impossible for him to argue, or put him in the difficulty that he had come unprepared to deal with what turned out to be the real point to be argued. For these reasons I take a different view on this point from that which the learned judge took. It turns on a very small point as to the meaning of a few words. Having regard to the view I take on the first point, I think that the appeal should be dismissed, but having regard to the conclusion reached by my brothers the appeal must be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: To my regret I find myself unable to agree with my Lord as regards the answer to the first question in this case, i.e., the question whether on the facts the plaintiffs had, with respect to their Paddington Street and Chiltern Street site, begun works for the erection of a building. The facts, if I might briefly recapitulate them, were these. The plaintiffs had entered into a building agreement with respect to the site, under which the plaintiffs were bound, directly or indirectly, to the Portman estate to erect a building in accordance with certain plans and specifications approved by the Portman estate. The plaintiffs had obtained planning permission, subject to the conditions which my Lord has mentioned, and to which I will return, for the erection of that same building. With a view to carrying out the project and in accordance with their contractual obligations under the building agreement, the plaintiffs had cleared the site for the erection of the projected new building, although the supervening difficulties occasioned by rumours of war and ultimately by war itself had prevented them from carrying the project any further than that.

Those being the facts in barest outline, had any works for the erection of a building been begun on this site, but not completed before the appointed day, within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 78 (1)? The answer to that question turns in the end on the meaning to be attached to the phrase "works for the erection or alteration of a building" contained in the sub-section, but, in approaching the construction of that phrase, it seems to me legitimate to bear in mind that the manifest object of s. 78 (1) was to accord some measure of protection to a building owner, who, on the faith of planning permission given under the law as it stood before the commencement of the Act of 1947, had incurred expenditure and done work with a view to the carrying out of a building project covered by such permission. Therefore, it seems to me that the intention of the section makes it of relatively little importance whether the actual work in question is work of demolition or of construction or of anything else, provided it is clear on the facts that that work did genuinely form part of the operations necessary to carry out a building project which would have been permitted under the old law.

Returning to the phrase against that background, it is "works for the erection or alteration of a building". That phrase seems to me to be a phrase of wide import, and the inference is that it was adopted so as to cover a wide field of work. If the legislature had intended to confine the application of s. 78 (1) to cases where buildings had been begun, but had not been completed, inevitably the section would have run: "Where the erection or alteration of a building has been begun, but not completed". Here we have "works for the erection or alteration of a building", so as to include in terms operations which are not in themselves building operations. For my part I find irresistible the conclusion reached by HARMAN, J., as to the meaning of these words when he said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 1028):

“It is clear that the erection of a building need not have been begun, because otherwise no meaning would have been given to the words ‘works for’.”

It is, therefore, in my view, not necessary, in order to bring a case within the sub-section, that one should be able to point to some work of construction on the site and say: “That is part of the new building the erection of which has been begun”. It is enough if on the facts one can conclude that on the site in question operations have been carried out which are part of the totality of operations necessary on that site for the purpose of carrying to completion a particular building project. Where it is shown by the evidence that a building owner had in view a particular building project to be carried out on a site already built on and that his intention to carry out that project had never been abandoned, then work such as the demolition of the buildings already on the site, as a necessary preliminary to the carrying out of the building project, would, in my judgment, be “works for the erection or alteration of a building” within the meaning of the sub-section. Of course, where the works are of such a nature that in themselves they might or might not be works which were being carried out for the purpose of executing some particular building project, it may well be that the onus is then on the building owner to show, and to show clearly, that his intention from the outset had been to carry some particular building project through to a finish. Obviously, where a man had started pulling down a house with no more than a general intention of erecting something else in its place, he could not come within the sub-section. Indeed, the very frame of the sub-section and the whole scheme of the Act would exclude such a one from the benefit of the sub-section, for s. 78 (1) in itself contemplates and necessarily refers only to a case where there is a projected building or alteration in respect of which planning permission has been obtained.

In the present case, on the footing that the construction of the phrase “works for the erection or alteration of a building” which I have adopted is the right construction, there is, to my mind, no doubt that, in commencing and carrying out through their contractors the demolition of the existing buildings, the plaintiffs had begun works for the erection of a building. There is no doubt about their intention. There is no doubt about the identity of the projected building. Not only was it the building referred to in the planning permission obtained in 1938, but it was also the building which the plaintiffs were under contract, directly or indirectly, with the Portman estate to erect. HARMAN, J., as appears from his judgment, might well have come to the same conclusion as I have reached but for the fact that the plaintiffs, in the events which happened, entered into a contract for the demolition of the existing buildings with a demolition specialist who did not undertake any of the work of constructing the new building, whereas, so far as the work of constructing the new building was concerned, they had dealt with that separately through a firm named Bovis, Ltd., and had only made provisional arrangements with them for the building work, not amounting to a firm contract. But for my part, provided it is plain that the building owner concerned did genuinely intend to erect a particular, identifiable, projected building on the site of existing buildings, it cannot matter what contractual arrangements he may have made as regards the demolition of the old buildings and the erection of the new one. That is to say, the answer cannot depend on whether he has got one contractor to pull down and re-build or has got two contractors, one of whom is going to do the demolition and the other the construction. Here, I think, the projected building is well identified, if only by reference to the building agreement.

The argument to the contrary, pressed on us by counsel for the London County Council, was to this effect. He said that the test to be applied in seeing whether given work qualified for the benefit of s. 78 (1) was a purely objective test, that one must go to the site and see whether there was any work begun but not completed on the site for which planning permission was required and had been obtained. Nothing short of that, according to him, would come within the sub-section. He put the matter in three points. He said that for s. 78 (1) to apply (a) there must be works which have been begun; (b) those works must be uncompleted; and (c) they must be part of an operation which required planning permission. He pointed out that demolition was not in any relevant respect an operation which required any planning permission at all. The work which had been begun here, he said, was simply the work of demolition, for which no such permission was necessary, and, therefore, it did not fall within the words

"those works could have been completed in conformity with the provisions of a planning scheme or of permission granted thereunder, or in accordance with permission granted by or under an interim development order."

Planning, he said, was quite irrelevant to demolition. In my view, that construction contains the fallacy that it treats "those works" as the particular type of work or type of operation that has been actually embarked on. Of course, if one applied s. 78 (1) to mere work of demolition taken by itself and treated that as "those works", there would be no question of those works having been the subject of permission, and it would be reasonably plain that the section did not apply. Moreover, the demolition as such, if treated as a separate thing, would not only have been begun; it would have been completed. But, in my view, that is wrong. I think "those works" must mean the works for the erection or alteration of the particular building referred to earlier in the sub-section. I think that must be so, for the test of the application of the sub-section where it is satisfied in other respects must, as it seems to me, be whether the permission was granted for the carrying out of the projected building operations to completion and not whether permission was granted for some mere branch or department of the work. If "those works" is construed in that way, I think the argument no longer applies.

Counsel for the London County Council also suggested that "works" in this context should be construed as meaning works which have something in the nature of a physical presence on the land, as opposed to mere demolition which cannot be said to leave anything physically present on the land, but merely produces an empty space where buildings existed before. He referred us to a number of sections (I will not take up time by referring to them again) where there were references to (for instance) the demolition or alteration of any buildings or works or to decisions that any buildings or works should be altered or removed, and there is no doubt that there are through the Act a number of references to works in contexts which show that "works" are regarded as physical objects. But I do not think it follows that in every case "works" is to be given that meaning. For instance, in s. 30 (6) of the Act of 1947, which is one of the sections dealing with ancient buildings, there is the passage to which counsel referred us to the effect that so long as any building is included in any list compiled or approved under this section no person shall execute, or cause or permit to be executed, any works for the demolition of the building. Counsel for the plaintiffs referred us to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 44, which provided, as to works below high-water mark, that "Nothing in this Act shall authorise the execution of any works whether of construction, demolition or alteration on, over or under tidal lands below high-water mark of ordinary spring tides . . ."

Therefore, it seems to me that the word "works" is well capable in this legislation of including works of demolition, and I think that is in accordance with ordinary English usage in the field of building operations, where the expression "works" is current.

The point is a short one and does not admit of any great elaboration. As my Lord has said, it is largely a matter of first impression. We were pressed by counsel for the London County Council with the absurdities that might arise if the plaintiffs' construction of the sub-section were adopted. What, it is said, of a man who, allegedly with a view to the ultimate erection of a new building, sets about demolishing an existing building and has got no further than removing two tiles or a gutter? It is suggested that in a case of that kind it would be absurd to give the individual in question the protection of s. 78 (1), even though the project of which the removal of the two tiles or the gutter was the beginning was a project in respect of which in all relevant matters planning permission had actually been obtained under the old law. But arguments by way of reductio ad absurdum cut both ways, and, on the other hand, it might equally be said to be absurd that a building owner who had spent thousands of pounds on the demolition of valuable buildings with a view to erecting another building in their place should not be protected merely because he had not actually started the building work, while another person who had prepared his site at far less cost should be protected because his work had just arrived at the stage of construction and it was possible by diligent search to find somewhere on the site two bricks laid one on top of the other in the positions which they would respectively occupy in the completed building. As I have said, it is a question of first impression, and I will say no more about it except that, after giving the best attention I can to the arguments the other way, and with some diffidence owing to the different opinion of my Lord, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs, within the meaning of s. 78 (1), had begun works for the erection of a building on the site in question before the appointed day, but had not completed them before the appointed day, with the result that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in this case provided they can bring themselves within the second branch of the sub-section.

To do that, as my Lord has said, they must show that immediately before the appointed day those works—i.e., as I construe the sub-section, the totality of the building operations—could have been completed in conformity with the provisions of a planning scheme or of permission granted thereunder or in accordance with permission granted under an interim development order. If that was so then in the words of the sub-section

"... if any permission required under the Restriction of Ribbon Development Act, 1935, for the carrying out of those works was granted, planning permission shall, by virtue of this section, be deemed to be granted under Part III of this Act in respect of the completion of those works."

That depends on the effect of the conditional planning permission of Aug. 9, 1938, having regard to the terms of s. 10 of the Act of 1932 and of the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933, art. 10. The vital provision is in s. 10 (3), to which my Lord has already referred. I hope I will be excused for reading it again:

"Where an application for permission to develop land is made to the specified authority in manner provided by the order, the authority may, subject to the terms of the order, grant the application unconditionally or subject to such conditions as they think proper to impose, or may refuse the application, and they shall be deemed to have granted the application unconditionally unless within two months from the receipt thereof, or within such longer period as the applicant may agree in writing to allow, they give notice to him that they have decided to the contrary, stating their reasons for so doing."

The whole matter, so far as it depends on s. 10 (3), turns on the meaning of the words "to the contrary". As a matter of language, I think it is reasonably plain that "notice . . . that they have decided to the contrary" must mean notice that they have decided not to grant the application unconditionally, the words being

"they shall be deemed to have granted the application unconditionally unless . . . they give notice . . . that they have decided to the contrary."

In my view, that must mean that they have decided not to grant it unconditionally. It is said on the other side that "to the contrary" connotes an exact opposite, a complete negation of what has gone before, as opposed to a mere variation of what has gone before, and it is suggested, therefore, that "decided to the contrary" means "decided not to grant it". With respect to those who think otherwise, I cannot accept that, as a matter of language. But, if it is accepted, it seems to me that grave difficulties ensue, for then the relevant part of sub-s. (3) reads: "The authority may . . . grant the application unconditionally or subject to such conditions as they think proper to impose, or may refuse the application, and they shall be deemed to have granted the application unconditionally unless . . . they give notice . . . that they have decided not to grant the application, stating their reasons for so doing", and that would, apparently, produce the result that they could never grant an application conditionally, because in all cases they would be deemed to have granted the application unconditionally unless they gave notice that they had decided not to grant the application at all.

Accordingly, I think that s. 10 (3) really admits of only one construction. I appreciate the force of the learned judge's observations to the effect that one can understand that where unqualified refusal was in question it was very desirable that reasons should be given, but that where it was merely a matter of imposing conditions, and, subject to those conditions, allowing the application, it was not apparent why reasons should be considered necessary, for the applicant would receive his permission with the conditions on which it was granted stated for him to see, and would, therefore, for the purposes of any appeal, know exactly what the conditions were. I also agree with my Lord that one can imagine examples where the giving of reasons for the imposition of conditions would be a palpable absurdity. But these considerations, in my judgment, are not enough to override what seems to me to be the reasonably plain language of s. 10 (3). My Lord has referred to the support which this construction derives from s. 10 (5), and I need not take up time by developing that point again. One may add that the Town and Country Planning (Interim Development) Act, 1943, which reversed the former rule and enacted (in effect) that permission should be deemed to be refused unless it was granted, seems to assume the construction of s. 10 (3) which I have placed on it, for one finds in s. 2 (5) of the Act of 1943 that "Nothing in this section shall be construed as affecting the duty of an interim development authority . . . (b) to give notice to the applicant of their decision upon the consideration of any such application, including, where the application is refused or granted subject to conditions, a statement of the reasons for their decision."

I am, therefore, of opinion that, inasmuch as the authority here failed to state their reasons for granting the permission of Aug. 9, 1938, subject to conditions and not unconditionally, they must be deemed by the terms of s. 10 (3) to have granted the application unconditionally. Other grounds of objection to this form of permission were urged before us which would lead to substantially the same consequences. Counsel for the plaintiffs endeavoured to persuade us that the first condition, which imposed a time limit for the completion of the work after which the consent was expressed to become null and void was wholly ultra vires and, therefore, bad. I cannot take that view, for s. 10 (3) expressly empowers the authority to grant the application subject to such conditions as they think proper to impose without anything relevant to the question of time to suggest that the generality of that expression is to be in any way cut down. There is nothing expressly to the effect that conditions as to time are not to be imposed, and I can find nothing in the other provisions of the Act which would make the imposition of a time condition so palpably repugnant as to be by necessary implication outside the purview of the Act, and, therefore, ultra vires. Accordingly, I cannot accept the argument based on ultra vires, though the plaintiffs achieve the same goal by a different road.

It only remains to mention the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933, art. 10, which provides:

"The grant or refusal of permission by the interim development authority for development to proceed shall be in writing and, where the authority decide to grant permission subject to conditions, or to refuse permission, the reasons for their decision shall be stated in writing."

That reinforces the view that the authority is placed under a statutory duty to give reasons for its decision where the decision is to grant permission subject to conditions or to refuse permission, and I think the result might well have been that failure by an authority to give reasons would have enabled an aggrieved applicant, by appropriate process, to obtain an order on them to state their reasons. But I am not satisfied that art. 10 of the order would in itself affect the actual validity of a refusal or the actual validity of conditions purporting to be attached to a consent. I prefer, therefore, to base myself simply on the construction of s. 10 (3) and the construction which I have placed on that sub-section leads, as I have said, to the conclusion that permission must be deemed to have been granted. It follows, in the view I take, that the plaintiffs succeed on both the questions on which their claim to the benefit of s. 78 (1) depends, and they are, accordingly, entitled to such benefit. The appeal should, therefore, be allowed.

MORRIS, L.J.: The first question which arises in this appeal is whether the plaintiffs bring themselves within the opening words of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 78. The inquiry is raised whether works for the erection of a building had been begun before the appointed day, viz., July 1, 1948. The Act of 1947 contains a number of definitions. There is a definition of the phrase "buildings or works", but no definition is to be found of the word "works". The word "erection" is defined as follows:

"'erection' in relation to buildings includes extension, alteration and re-erection."

"Building operations" is defined to include

"re-building operations, structural alterations of or additions to buildings, and other operations normally undertaken by a person carrying on business as a builder."

There is also a definition of the word "clearing", which

"in relation to land, means the removal of buildings or materials from the land, the levelling of the surface of the land, and the carrying out of such other operations in relation thereto as may be prescribed by regulations made for the purposes of this Act."

There is, of course, a definition of "development", which I do not read again.

In the course of his submissions on this part of the case counsel for the London County Council submitted that the word "works" should be interpreted as denoting some positive operations of a constructional nature. Another part of his submissions was that when the word "works" in the second line of s. 78 is compared with the phrase "those works", to be found in the fourth line of s. 78, it is manifest that there is a reference to the same thing, and counsel submits that the reference is to what he has described as the "controlled operations". So he submits that the word "works" denotes operations of a positive, constructional nature for which permission was needed, and he submits that permission was not needed under the Act of 1932 for demolition. In support of the first of those two submissions to which I have referred, counsel has invited our attention to a number of sections of the Act of 1947 where the word "works" is to be found. He has, for example, referred us to s. 30 (6), to s. 23 (2), to s. 26 (1) (b), and to other sections. In some places the reference is to the words "buildings or works". We were also referred, by counsel for the plaintiffs, to s. 44 of the Act of 1932. The word "works" also appears in the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, in s. 75, which begins with the words: "Where any works on land existing at the appointed day were carried out".

In the absence of any definition of the word "works" it seems to me that the word is not to be regarded as a term of art, but that it is really quite a wide term. The word may not be used in all places with precisely the same meaning. It has, in my judgment, in s. 78 the meaning of things done or to be done. I do not myself attempt any definition of the word, for the obvious reason that, as Parliament has not defined it, it would be unnecessary, and, perhaps, unfortunate, to attempt a definition. The word has a wide variety of meanings. It is, for example, used in ordinary speech in the phrase "works of charity", presumably to denote no more than things done of a charitable nature. In its context in s. 78, in my judgment, the word refers to the totality of things necessary to be done for the purpose of erecting a building. The phrase has to be regarded in reference to the facts of each particular case. The question whether works for the erection of a building have been begun becomes, in my judgment, a question of fact and of degree, depending on the circumstances of each particular case. What happened in the present case was that after the plaintiffs had, in August, 1938, obtained the consent of the London County Council under the General Interim Development Order, 1933, they then proceeded to get tenders for the erection of a building, including demolition and the clearance of the site. They received a number of tenders, but each one of the tenders received exceeded the amount that they had been led to expect would be the probable amount having regard to figures supplied to them by their quantity surveyor. So, according to the affidavit of Mr. Lees, it was decided to entrust the work to Bovis, Ltd. Because of the international situation there was delay. By the early part of 1939 the Portman estate were pressing the architects to begin building operations. In para. 9 of his affidavit Mr. Lees said:

"By March, 1939, however, the Portman estate, as freeholders, were pressing the company through its architects to commence building operations in accordance with the agreement A.E.L.2 and pointed out that the agreement provided for completion of the entire building by the month of December, 1939. Accordingly, in April, 1939, the company decided to commence building operations and as a first step to proceed with the necessary works of demolition and clearance from the site of all existing buildings."

In his judgment HARMAN, J., says ([1951] 2 All E.R. 1027):

"Mr. Lees, estate manager of the plaintiffs, who was cross-examined before me, stated that when the plaintiffs entered into this contract they intended to proceed, after the demolition was completed, with their re-building scheme. This evidence I accept. Indeed, the conclusion seems obvious, for persons in the plaintiffs' position, who are paying some £800 a year in rent, do not demolish buildings which might reasonably be expected to let for a considerable part at any rate of that sum unless they intend to replace them by other buildings more to their purpose."

It seems to me that the effect of the evidence accepted by the learned judge was that the plaintiffs, after a delay, did decide to begin works for the erection of a building. It does not seem to me to matter at all that one part of the works was assigned by contract to one contractor and that the rest was to be undertaken by another contractor. It might be, in the circumstances of a different case, that work of demolition could not be described as "works for the erection of a building". But, as I have indicated, in my judgment the matter is one of fact and degree, depending on the circumstances of each case. In this case, in my view, the plaintiffs did decide to begin, and did begin, works for the erection of their new building.

In regard to the second of the two submissions of counsel for the London County Council to which I referred, in my judgment, the works "could have been completed in accordance with permission granted under an interim development order", assuming that that permission was valid. The works must be deemed to be the totality of what had to be done to erect the building. Those works could have been completed in accordance with the permission granted. The words in s. 78 (1) do not involve that permission is needed for each and every part, phase and deed, provided that the work of erection can be completed within the ambit of permission so that when the building is complete nothing is out of conformity with or out of accord with or beyond any permission given where any permission is required. With a diffidence which I naturally feel when I find that my opinion does not coincide with that of my Lord, the Master of the Rolls, I have reached the conclusion on this first question that the plaintiffs had begun works for the erection of a building before the appointed day.

The second question is whether there was permission under an interim development order. The interim development order that was in operation was that of 1933. Section 10 of the Act of 1932 is in different terms from s. 45 of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1919; and the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933, is in different terms from the Town Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1922 (S.R. & O., 1922, No. 927). Under that order, by art. 7, it was provided:

"The local authority shall as soon as may be, inform the applicant in writing that his application for permission to proceed is granted or refused, as the case may be, and, if the application is granted, state in writing the terms of any requirements which they may impose."

But the Act of 1932 introduced new language, and the language of s. 10 (3) calls for consideration. I need not refer to s. 2 of the Act of 1943, which has been referred to by JENKINS, L.J. The provision in that Act is not decisive, but it is at least interesting to note the interpretation that then was assumed.

In regard to the question whether it was legitimate to impose a condition in regard to time, I am in full agreement with all that my Lords have said and I do not desire to add anything. Section 10 (3) provides that three courses may be followed, and they are stated in this order: first, the authority may grant unconditionally; or, secondly, they may grant subject to conditions; or, thirdly, they may refuse. The section then provides that they shall be deemed to have granted unconditionally unless within two months they shall give notice "that they have decided to the contrary, stating their reasons". That, in my judgment, means, to the contrary of granting unconditionally, which was the first of the three possibilities. What, then, is the contrary, or the opposite, of granting unconditionally? Perhaps the most obvious opposite is the second, viz., granting conditionally; but also there is the third, viz., refusing. It seems to me, therefore, to follow that the application was to be deemed to have been granted unconditionally unless two things were done—(i) unless there was notice that the authority had decided to the contrary of granting unconditionally, and (ii) unless they had given reasons. There is no dispute that in the present case the authority did not give reasons. It, therefore, follows that they must be deemed to have granted permission unconditionally. It is no answer to say that reasons might have been given which would have been poor in quality or in quantity, or which might have contained glimpses of the obvious. The result, therefore, is that, in my judgment, following the words of s. 78 (1) of the Act of 1947, planning permission should, by virtue of the section, be deemed to be granted under Part III of the Act of 1947 in respect of the completion of those works. From that conclusion the consequence as to development charge follows. I am, therefore, in agreement that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: J. C. Parry (for the plaintiffs); J. G. Barr (for the London County Council); Treasury Solicitor (for the Central Land Board).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL v. CALLINGHAM AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Morris, L.J.J., and Lloyd-Jacob, J.), February 13, 14, April 7, 1952.]

Town and Country Planning—Development—“ Building ”—“ Works on land ”—Construction of model village, railway and racecourse—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 12 (2), s. 75 (9), s. 119 (1).

Town and Country Planning—Enforcement of planning control—Land subject to resolution to prepare planning scheme—Development carried out, without permission, before interim development order made—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 75 (9).

The occupier of a piece of land constructed thereon a model village, a toy railway, a miniature racecourse, and other features. The buildings were from two feet to four feet high and were constructed mainly of stone or brick and fixed to concrete bases in the ground. By August, 1929, part of the village was completed. On Sept. 24, 1929, the local authority passed a resolution to prepare a town planning scheme for the district under the Town Planning Act, 1925, the resolution being registered as a local land charge on Sept. 30, 1929. The village was substantially completed between that date and Apr. 1, 1933, when the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933, made under s. 10 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, came into force, and after Apr. 1, 1933, the model railway was extended and further buildings added, but no permission for this additional work was obtained under the order of 1933. In October, 1950, the local planning authority served on the occupier an enforcement notice under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 23 and s. 75 (9), requiring him to demolish or remove building, engineering and other operations on the land.

HELD: the works completed before Sept. 24, 1929, or begun or contracted for before that date were “ existing buildings ” within the order of 1933; the later works were “ works on land ” within s. 75 (9) of the Act of 1947; the words of para. (a) of that sub-section covered works begun after the date of the resolution and completed before Apr. 1, 1933, when the order of 1933 (which, by s. 119 (1) of the Act of 1947, was the “ interim development order ” for the purpose of para. (a)) came into force, as well as works so begun but not completed until after Apr. 1, 1933; no permission for any of those works had been obtained under the order of 1933; and, therefore, the works had been carried out “ in contravention of previous planning control ” within s. 75 (9), and under s. 75 (1) the enforcement notice served under s. 23 (1) was good.

APPEAL by the occupier of land on which a model village was constructed and by a trustee of the organisation operating the model railway therein against an order of the Divisional Court dated Oct. 12, 1951, and reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 822.

The respondents, the Buckinghamshire County Council, served an enforcement notice on the appellants under s. 23 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, requiring them to demolish or remove building, engineering and other operations known as the Bekonscot Model Village and Railway. The appellants preferred a complaint to the justices that the notice was wrongly served, on the ground that the operations were not "works on land" and that they had not been carried out in contravention of previous planning control within s. 75 (9) of the Act. On Mar. 9, 1951, the complaint was heard by Buckinghamshire justices who found that the works were not within the ambit of the planning Acts, and quashed the enforcement notice. The county council appealed to the Divisional Court, who held that the works were within the Acts, and that the enforcement notice applied to work done since Sept. 24, 1929 (the date of the town planning resolution). The appellants appealed.

H. P. Stirling (H. I. Willis with him) for the appellants.

W. L. Roots for the county council.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 7. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of the Divisional Court made on a Case stated by Buckinghamshire justices. I am clearly of opinion that that which has taken place at Bekonscot is "development" within the definition of that term in s. 53 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, and in s. 12 (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. To carry the matter a stage further back, that which was done was within the words "the development of estates and building operations" which might be permitted to proceed pending the preparation or adoption and approval of a scheme under s. 45 of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1919, and the same words appear in the Town Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1922, made under the Act. There is no substance in the submission that because this is a model village, or because the buildings are small, neither is, or are, within the planning legislation. The appellants could, had they so desired, have applied to the local authority for permission under the order of 1922, but they did not do so. No material change in this respect was made by the Town Planning Act, 1925.

The more difficult position is that which arises as to buildings, etc., erected after the date (Sept. 24, 1929) of the resolution of the local authority to prepare a town planning scheme and before the coming into force of the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933 (S.R. & O., 1933, No. 236). The order of the Divisional Court does not affect buildings or development before the date of the resolution, but under the order development after that date is held to be subject to the powers given by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The earlier Acts envisaged the adoption of a scheme and the payment of compensation to a person whose land was injuriously affected by such a scheme, but compensation was not payable on account of any building erected on land involved in a scheme after the date of the resolution of the local authority to prepare or adopt a scheme: see s. 58 of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1909, s. 45 of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1919, and sched. II thereto, and s. 10 (2), of the Town Planning Act, 1925. The Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, by s. 10, imposed on the Minister a duty to make a general order with respect to the interim development of land within the areas to which resolutions to prepare or adopt a scheme applied. The order of 1933 followed; it revoked the order of 1922. Article 2 (1) of the order of 1933 takes one back to the date of the resolution of Sept. 24, 1929, for it defines "existing building" as "a building erected or constructed before the resolution date, and includes a building . . . begun before, but completed after, that date" and the "resolution date" means the date on which a resolution or an application or authority to prepare or adopt a scheme took effect. Thus, it seems clear that buildings erected after Sept. 24, 1929, but before the coming into force of the Act of 1932 and order of 1933 were not existing buildings for the purpose of the Act and order.

Section 13 of the Act of 1932 gives the responsible authority power to enforce schemes and carry them into effect by removing, pulling down, or altering buildings. Under s. 18 any person whose property was injuriously affected thereby could obtain compensation, but s. 20 (2) provided that such compensation should not be recoverable unless the building, &c., was an existing building. It follows that, if there had been a scheme under the Act of 1932, any building erected without permission after the 1929 resolution could have been pulled down without payment of compensation. There was no scheme, and all this was washed away by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, Part III of which deals with control of development. Permission to develop land is required, and ss. 12 to 19 cover that. Section 23 deals with enforcement of planning control after the appointed day, and it is under this section that notices were served, and that the appellants appealed to the court of summary jurisdiction. Section 75 (1) makes this procedure available where any works on land existing at the appointed day were carried out in contravention of previous planning control.

It is claimed on behalf of the appellants that the buildings were not works on land erected in contravention of previous planning control. True, no permission had been asked for or given, and to that extent the appellants were at risk. The planning authority might have taken steps under s. 13 of the Act of 1932 if a scheme had been adopted and approved, and no compensation would have been payable, but the Act of 1932 was repealed by the Act of 1947 and no steps can now be taken under the Act of 1932, it is said.

It becomes necessary to consider s. 75 (9) of the Act of 1947:

"For the purposes of this section, works on land shall be deemed to have been carried out . . . in contravention of previous planning control—(a) where at the material time the land was subject to a resolution to prepare a planning scheme, if carried out or begun otherwise than in accordance with permission granted in that behalf by or under the interim . . . order."

The interim development order here is the order of 1933. I should add that under s. 18 (1) of the Act of 1947 (amplified by s. 75 (4)) the power to grant permission to develop land under Part III includes power to grant permission for the retention on land of any buildings or works constructed or carried out thereon before the date of the application, from which it would seem that the appellants could have applied in respect of the buildings erected between 1929 and 1932.

The question for decision is whether it is shown that such buildings were erected otherwise than in accordance with permission granted under the order of 1933. The answer seems to me to be clear. No permission was asked or given, and, consequently, they were not erected in accordance with permission given under that order. And if I am right in my reading of s. 18 (1) and s. 75 (4) of the Act of 1947, it provides no sort of excuse to say that application could not be made under the order of 1933 for something done before the date of the order (assuming that to be right), for application was possible under s. 18 and s. 75 (4) of the Act of 1947, and, if the application had been successful, no question of enforcement under s. 23 would have arisen. It must not be taken that I agree that no application was possible under art. 5 of the order of 1933 to permit a development of this land merely because some part of the work of development had been commenced or carried out after the date of the resolution and before the coming into force of the order of 1933—as to which see the transitional provisions in s. 52 (2) of the Act of 1932 and ss. 53 and 54.

The scheme of the town planning legislation is to control planning and development. Under the Act of 1932 and the order of 1933 existing buildings (as defined) are not affected. The definition of existing buildings in the order does not cover buildings erected after the date of the resolution unless they were begun before that date. Under s. 52 (2) of the Act of 1932 the resolution of 1929 is to have effect as if it were a resolution passed by the authority and approved by the Ministry under the Act of 1932. Section 54 repeals the Act of 1925, but nothing in the repeal is to affect any approval or consent given under any enactment repealed, from which it would appear to follow that, if any works were carried out for which permission was given, it could not be said that they were otherwise than in accordance with the order made under the Act of 1932. In my opinion, the works begun after the date of the resolution and before the order of 1933 came into force, were carried out or begun otherwise than in accordance with permission granted in that behalf by or under the interim development order, and this appeal should be dismissed. Buildings begun before the date of the resolution and completed afterwards would, however, appear to fall within the definition of "existing building" in the order.

MORRIS, L.J.: On Sept. 24, 1929, the Beaconsfield urban district council passed a resolution to prepare a town planning scheme for the Beaconsfield urban district. No question is raised in regard to anything which was done at Bekonscot on or before such date. There was then in force the Town Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1922, which was made by the Minister of Health under s. 45 of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1919. Though the Town Planning Act, 1925, repealed that part of the Housing, Town Planning, etc., Act, 1919, which contained s. 45, it was provided by s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1925 that the repeal should not affect any order made under the repealed part of the Act of 1919, and that any order should have effect as if made under the corresponding provision of the Act of 1925. Section 4 of the Act of 1925 contained provisions which corresponded with s. 45 of the Act of 1919. In each section is to be found the phrase "development of estates and building operations". The phrase is, therefore, found in the Town Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1922. After the passing of the resolution to prepare a town planning scheme it was open to the appellants to apply to the local authority for permission to do any work that would come within the phrase "development of estates and building operations." The work in fact done between the end of September, 1929, and Apr. 1, 1933, consisted, as the justices have found, in completing the village in the south-west of the area, together with the model railway on the land. The justices find that during such period the development had become known as "the Bekonscot Model Village and Railways." On the facts as found, I am of the opinion that the work done during that period would properly fall to be described as being within the phrase "development of estates and building operations." No application for permission was in fact made.

The Town Planning Act, 1925, was repealed by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, which came into operation on Apr. 1, 1933. Section 10 (1) of the Act of 1932 is in these terms:

"The Minister shall make a general order with respect to the interim development of land within the areas to which resolutions to prepare or adopt a scheme apply and may make special orders with respect to the interim development of such land in any particular area. For the purposes of this section the expression 'interim development' means development between the date on which the resolution takes effect, and the date of the coming into operation of the scheme."

"Development" is defined in relation to any land as including any building operations or re-building operations and any use of the land or any building thereon for a purpose which is different from the purpose for which the land or building was last being used. The word "buildings" is defined as including structures and erections, and the phrase "building operations" is defined as including any road works preliminary or incidental to the erection of buildings.

In exercise of the powers conferred on him by s. 10 of the Act of 1932 the Minister of Health made the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933, which came into force on Apr. 1, 1933. By art. 4 of that order certain development was permitted pending the coming into operation of a scheme. Included in such permitted development were in the case of an existing building: (i) works necessary for the maintenance of the building; and (ii) works of alteration neither affecting the exterior of the building, nor proposed in connection with a different use of the building. An "existing building" was defined as meaning a building erected or constructed before the date on which a resolution or an application for authority to prepare or adopt a scheme took effect. It also included a building erected or constructed in pursuance of a contract made before or begun before, but completed after, the resolution date.

It was found by the justices that small replacements to the model buildings in the village were carried out from time to time. The justices have not specified, however, or have not found what "buildings" were erected or constructed before the date on which the resolution took effect. It will, in my judgment, be necessary to have findings as to this matter. It is to be pointed out that any "buildings" begun before, but completed after, such date, or any "buildings" erected or constructed in pursuance of a contract made before such date, are likewise to be regarded as "existing buildings." The justices found that after Apr. 1, 1933, the railway was extended and further model buildings were erected outside the area of the original village. In my judgment, the railway is either a "structure" or an "erection", and the model buildings are also either structures or erections. Small or model buildings may only be small structures or small erections, but they are, nevertheless, within the definition of the word "buildings".

No application for planning permission was made after Apr. 1, 1933, and, in my judgment, the work done after such date was work for which within the definitions in the Act of 1932 and the General Interim Development Order of 1933 permission might have been sought. By art. 3 of the Town and Country Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1933, it was provided that the Town Planning (General Interim Development) Order, 1922, was revoked.

Although I have referred to the permissions which the appellants could have sought under the General Interim Development Orders of 1922 and 1933, the matters arising in the present appeal fall to be determined by reference to the construction of s. 75 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. By one part of that Act it was provided that general permission was required in respect of any development of land which was carried out after July 1, 1948. The expression "development" meant (subject to some exceptions) the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land. Certain provisions for the enforcement of planning control were embodied in s. 23 of the Act. It was then provided by s. 75 (1) as follows:

"Where any works on land existing at the appointed day were carried out, or any use to which land is put on that day was begun, in contravention of previous planning control, then, subject to the provisions of this section, the provisions of Part III of this Act with respect to enforcement notices shall apply in relation thereto as they apply in relation to development carried out after the appointed day without the grant of permission in that behalf under the said Part III: Provided that an enforcement notice shall not be served by virtue of the provisions of this section in respect of any works or use (not being works or a use carried out or begun during the war period as defined by the Building Restrictions (War-Time Contraventions) Act, 1946) at any time after three years from the appointed day."

The notice which was served on Oct. 24, 1950, by the Buckinghamshire County Council (who were then the local planning authority) on the appellants was served in reliance on the provisions of s. 75 of the Act of 1947. The planning authority must show that any "works on land" or any user, to which they take exception, were carried out or begun in contravention of previous planning control. There is no definition in the Act of the phrase "works on land". The notice served on the appellants shows that the county council adopted the language of the definition of "development" contained in the Act of 1947. The notice began with the words following:

"Take notice that the county council of the administrative county of Buckingham, as the local planning authority, in pursuance of their powers under s. 23 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, hereby declare that the development specified in the first column of the schedule hereto had been carried out in contravention of previous planning control as defined in s. 75 of the said Act."

The notice then required that the steps should be taken which were set out in the second column of the schedule. The schedule was as follows:

"Development. (1) Use of land lying between Warwick Road and Lethborough Lane in the urban district of Beaconsfield in the county of Buckingham for purposes other than the curtilage of a private dwelling-house namely for the purpose of a public exhibition known as Bekonscot Model Village. Steps required to be taken: Discontinuance."

Then:

"Development: (2) Building, engineering and other operations in and on land lying between Warwick Road and Lethborough Lane in the urban district of Beaconsfield in the county of Buckingham comprising Bekonscot Model Village. Steps required to be taken: Demolition and/or removal."

It will be seen that the heading of column 1 was "development", and that under item no. 2 the words employed are words taken from the definition of "development" which is contained in the Act of 1947.

The justices held that by August, 1929, the general lay-out of the model village and railway and of the garden had been fixed, and the user of the area for its present user had been established. Because of the findings of the justices the county council did not contend before the Divisional Court that there should be discontinuance so far as user was concerned. They did not, therefore, rely on item 1 of the schedule. That was for the reason that on the findings of the justices the change of user was begun before the date of the resolution to prepare a scheme. Similarly, in relation to item 2, the county council did not call for any demolition or removal of any building, engineering or other operations which had been carried out before the resolution date. The appeal of the county council before the Divisional Court, which appeal succeeded, proceeded effectively only in relation to any building, engineering or other operations which had been carried out since the end of September, 1929.

It may seem somewhat incongruous that the county council should abandon complaint in regard to user of land for the purpose of a public exhibition known as Bekonscot Model Village, but should still proceed with a demand for the demolition or removal of some of the buildings which have for years been publicly exhibited as and have become known as Bekonscot Model Village. It is found by the justices that since as long ago as August, 1929, members of the public have been admitted to the area, and that by Apr. 1, 1933, the model village was substantially completed. But the task of the court can only be to decide whether the county council has been endowed with "a giant's strength". The court has not got the material before it to decide whether "it is tyrannous to use it like a giant". In my judgment, the work done by the appellants subsequently to the resolution clearly came within the words "works on land". It is not necessary to seek to define the phrase or to relate it to any statutory definitions, for I consider that the work done by the appellants came within the phrase "development of estates and building operations" as well as within the word "development" either with its meaning under the Act of 1932 or with its meaning under s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1947.

The inquiry next becomes whether the "works on land" were carried out "in contravention of previous planning control". In this connection it becomes necessary to consider s. 75 (9) which is in the following terms:

"For the purposes of this section, works on land shall be deemed to have been carried out, and uses of land to have been begun, in contravention of previous planning control—(a) where at the material time the land was subject to a resolution to prepare a planning scheme, if carried out or begun otherwise than in accordance with permission granted in that behalf by or under the interim development order; (b) where at the material time the land was subject to a planning scheme, if carried out or begun otherwise than in conformity with the provisions of the scheme or of permission granted thereunder; and where permission for any works or use was granted as aforesaid subject to conditions (in whatever form) restricting the period during which the works or use could be continued on the land, and that period has expired before the appointed day, the provisions of this section shall apply as if the works or use had been carried out or begun in contravention of previous planning control."

The words "interim development order" are defined in the Act to mean an order made under s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1932. If the definition of "interim development order" had included the General Development Order of 1922, then, once it is held that what the appellants did after Sept. 30, 1929, comes within the words "works on land", the appellants would be without argument. Such works would have been carried out otherwise than in accordance with permission granted under the Interim Development Orders of 1922 and 1933, for the appellants neither sought nor obtained permission. The question arises whether the appellants are better placed because s. 75 (9) refers only to the General Interim Development Order of 1933. In my judgment, they are not. The appellants carried out "works on land". The question must then be posed whether such works were carried out otherwise than in accordance with permission granted under the order of 1933. As there was no permission granted under the order of 1933, then, in my judgment, it follows that the works were otherwise than in accordance with permission granted under that order. It is said that the words should be read as referable only to the period subsequent to the order of 1933, for it is rightly said that permission under that order could only be obtained after the date of the order. But the words of the sub-section are not limited. Certain works on land are "to be deemed" to have been "in contravention of previous planning control". This choice of language was probably employed for the reason that under the Acts of 1919, 1925 and 1932 developers were not under compulsion of applying for interim development permission; they merely ran certain risks for the future if they proceeded to develop without having secured permission. It was, consequently, enacted by s. 75 (9) that certain works on land should be deemed to have been begun "in contravention of previous planning control". The works were so to have been deemed if they were begun otherwise than in accordance with permission granted under the order of 1933. The words, in my judgment, are wide enough and are apt to cover works carried out after the date of a resolution to prepare a planning scheme, but before as well as after the date of the order of 1933. Parliament has in effect enacted that, unless there was permission under the order of 1933, then works, excluding always anything coming within the definition of "existing buildings", subsequent to a resolution to prepare a scheme should be deemed to have been carried out in contravention of previous planning control. If in some case permission had, in fact, been given under the order of 1922, then, in the unlikely event of a suggestion being made that the words of s. 75 (9) would, nevertheless, apply, the effect of s. 54 of the Act of 1932 and of s. 113 of the Act of 1947 dealing with repeals and of certain other provisions would have to be considered. It may be that a permission given under the order of 1922 would be treated as a permission given under the order of 1933, but this matter does not call for decision, and I express no opinion on it.

I can see no escape from the applicability of s. 75 (9) to the present case, and the "works on land" which were carried out after the resolution took effect were carried out other than in accordance with permission granted in that behalf by or under an order made under s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1932. There is no proviso to, or limitation of, the relevant words of s. 75 (9) of the Act of 1947, and the result follows that, as the appellants' land was subject to a resolution to prepare a planning scheme, and as "works" were carried out on the land after such resolution, and as no permission for the carrying out of such works was granted under the General Interim Development Order of 1933, the works on land, save so far as they might be within the definition of "existing buildings", must be "deemed" to have been carried out in contravention of previous planning control for the purposes of s. 75 (1) of the Act. I, therefore, reach the conclusion that the judgment of the Divisional Court was correct, and that the results must follow which were consequent on this view.

LOYD-JACOB, J.: By this appeal the appellants seek to maintain that part of an order made by the Beaconsfield justices on Mar. 9, 1951, which, by an order of the King's Bench Divisional Court dated Oct. 12, 1951, was directed to be reversed. The part of the order in question concerned an enforcement notice dated Oct. 24, 1950, duly served by the county council on the appellants wherein demolition and/or removal was required in respect of "building, engineering and other operations in and on land lying between Warwick Road (sic) and Lethborough Lane in the urban district of Beaconsfield in the county of Buckingham comprising Bekonscot Model Village."

After the hearing before the justices, this enforcement notice was directed to be quashed both in respect of the demolition and removal as well as of the requested discontinuance of user of the site, which latter was not the subject of appeal.

The Case stated by the justices sets out their findings of fact, from which the following are extracted: (i) In September, 1929, a resolution to prepare a town planning scheme for the district was duly passed and entered on the register of local land charges. (ii) Prior to this date the following building, engineering and other operations had been commenced: (a) the construction of a pond, banks and rockeries; (b) foundations for a model railway; (c) erection of model buildings including church, school, post office and council offices. (iii) Prior to this date, the following had been completed: (a) The area of development had been delineated as comprising an area within the blue line on the plan and the general lay-out of the model village and railway within the red line and of the garden within the blue line had been fixed; (b) the public had been admitted on payment. (iv) Subsequent to the said date, but prior to Apr. 1, 1933, the following had been completed: (a), (b) and (c) above so far as they were situate within the red line on the plan. (v) Subsequent to Apr. 1, 1933, the railway was extended and model buildings erected outside the red line, but within the blue line on the plan. (vi) The model buildings above referred to are representative of those found in a village or town, constructed in the main of stone or brick on a concrete foundation to a scale of one inch to the foot. The justices concluded that the works complained of were not works to which s. 75 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, applied, and they proceeded under s. 23 (4) (a) and s. 75 (5) of that Act to quash the notice. On appeal the Divisional Court held that s. 75 of the Act of 1947 did apply to all the structures on this site erected after Sept. 30, 1929, and it is from that finding that the present appeal is brought,

The material portions of s. 75 are as follows. Sub-section (1): "... in contravention of previous planning control . . . " This phrase is not a term of art, and its definition follows in sub-s. (9).

" For the purposes of this section, works on land shall be deemed to have been carried out . . . in contravention of previous planning control—
(a) where at the material time the land was subject to a resolution to prepare a planning scheme, if carried out or begun otherwise than in accordance with permission granted in that behalf by or under the interim development order "

which order, by s. 119 (1), means an order made under s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1932.

At the time when the appellants commenced the development of the Bekonscot Model Village and the building operations which were comprised in that development, the provisions of the Town Planning Act, 1925, had not been made to apply to the area. There was, therefore, no planning control in operation to which they had any occasion to conform. The resolution to prepare a town planning scheme passed in September, 1929, brought into operation the provisions of the Act of 1925, whereby the opportunity to seek and obtain permission for further development under the order of 1922 was provided, an opportunity of which the occupiers did not choose to avail themselves. By s. 10 (2) any works, other than those approved under an interim development order, if carried out after the date of the resolution, were excluded from compensation should the powers in s. 7 to remove or alter them be exercised when the planning scheme was ultimately approved and adopted, but by proviso (a) to sub-s. (2) there is a special saving for work done or buildings finished if begun or contracted for earlier than the relative operative date, which for present purposes is the date of the resolution. Having regard to the findings of the justices, this would preserve to the appellants a right of compensation in respect of items (a), (b) and (c) above so far as the same were carried out before the date of the resolution and make it necessary for them to seek any permission by way of interim development order to carry out such completion. This completion could not, therefore, have been in contravention of previous planning control, for it was impliedly authorised by the then operative statute under which planning was controlled.

The extension of the railway and the erection of model buildings, if, as is plainly the case, these constitute development within the definition contained in s. 53 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, were such as to require permission under an interim development order if they were not to be at risk of demolition or alteration without compensation should a scheme which did not include them be ultimately approved by the Minister. This construction and erection, therefore, contravened planning control in the sense that it did not accord with the plans envisaged for ultimate adoption in respect of the locality, but no effective steps to remedy the contravention could be taken by the local authority until the planning scheme received the Minister's approval. This position continued until the Act of 1947 came into operation, which swept away this barrier and provided by s. 23 for enforcement of planning control from the appointed day. Section 75 (1) made the procedure for enforcement operative in respect of antecedent works if they were carried out in contravention of previous planning control, and s. 75 (9) defines such contravention. Two things require to be established: (a) that the land in question was subject to a resolution to prepare a planning scheme; (b) that the works do not conform with permission granted under the order of 1933. The appellants do not question the facts, and both requirements have been established. The extended buildings and erections must, accordingly, be held to be a contravention of previous planning control, and are, therefore, appropriate for condemnation under the enforcement notice.

The consequence of these conclusions may appear unfortunate, in that the continued user of the area for exhibition purposes is no longer challenged and the right to continue to use the buildings in question for such purposes cannot be assailed. The mutilation of the present lay-out by destruction of the remainder would appear to serve no useful purposes to anyone. This, however cogent for consideration by the Minister, is not a matter which concerns the court. In my judgment, therefore, in the result the order of the Divisional Court should be varied by excluding from the remitted matter any work done or buildings finished after Oct. 1, 1929, which had been begun or contracted for before that date.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Callingham, Griffith & Bate (for the appellants); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for G. R. Crouch, clerk of Buckinghamshire County Council (for the county council).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

LEE v. SHOWMEN'S GUILD OF GREAT BRITAIN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), March 20, 21, 24, April 4, 1952.]

Trade Union—Disciplinary action against member—Review of decision—Jurisdiction of court.

Domestic Tribunal—Review of decision—Jurisdiction of court.

In 1949 the plaintiff and one, S., both members of the defendant guild, applied to the local authority for a site on a fair ground. The plaintiff was allotted a position to which S. claimed, in accordance with a previous ruling of the guild, he was entitled. The plaintiff, nevertheless, occupied the site. By r. 14 (a) of the rules of the guild the committee of each section of the guild had power to impose a fine on any of its members who broke the rules, and, if the fine was not paid within one month, the member was deemed to have ceased to be a member of the guild. Rule 15 (c) provided: "No member of the guild shall indulge in unfair competition with regard to the renting, taking or letting of ground or position". On a complaint by S., a committee of the guild decided that the plaintiff was guilty of "unfair competition" within r. 15 (c), fined him, and, the fine not having been paid, resolved that he ceased to be a member. In an action by the plaintiff for declarations that the decisions of the committee were ultra vires and void,

HELD: the court had jurisdiction to examine any decision of the committee which involved a question of law, including one of the interpretation of the rules; on the facts the committee had mis-construed r. 15 (c) in finding that the plaintiff had been guilty of "unfair competition" within the meaning of that rule; and, therefore, the committee had acted ultra vires and their decision to expel the plaintiff was void.

AS TO TRADE UNION AGREEMENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 32, pp. 473-483, paras. 764-771; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 43, pp. 96-101, Nos. 1004-1052.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Dawkins v. Antrobus, (1881), 17 Ch.D. 615; 44 L.T. 557; 8 Digest 507, 18.
- (2) Leeson v. General Council of Medical Education & Registration, (1889), 43 Ch.D. 366; 59 L.J.Ch. 233; 61 L.T. 849; 34 Digest 544, 30.
- (3) Allinson v. General Council of Medical Education & Registration, [1894] 1 Q.B. 750; 63 L.J.Q.B. 534; 70 L.T. 471; 58 J.P. 542; 34 Digest 544, 24.
- (4) Maclean v. Workers' Union, [1929] 1 Ch. 602; 43 Digest 101, 1046.
- (5) Young v. Ladies' Imperial Club, [1920] 2 K.B. 523; 89 L.J.K.B. 563; 123 L.T. 191; 8 Digest 509, 25.

- (6) Amalgamated Society of Carpenters, Cabinet Makers & Joiners v. Braithwaite. General Union of Operative Carpenters and Joiners v. Ashley, [1921] 2 Ch. 399; affd. H.L., [1922] 2 A.C. 440; 91 L.J.Ch. 688; 128 L.T. 65; 43 Digest 100, 1043.
- (7) Rigby v. Connol. (1880), 14 Ch.D. 482; 49 L.J.Ch. 328; 42 L.T. 139; 8 Digest 512, 38.
- (8) Cookson v. Harewood, [1932] 2 K.B. 478, n.; 101 L.J.K.B. 394, n.; 146 L.T. 550, n.; Digest Supp. A
- (9) Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, [1911] 1 Ch. 540; 80 L.J.Ch. 315; 104 L.T. 267; 43 Digest 93, 972.
- (10) Abbott v. Sullivan, [1952] 1 All E.R. 226.
- (11) Baird v. Wells, (1890), 44 Ch.D. 661; 59 L.J.Ch. 673; 63 L.T. 312; 8 Digest 512, 39. B
- (12) Wood v. Wood, (1874), L.R. 9 Exch. 190; 43 L.J.Ex. 153; 30 L.T. 815; 8 Digest 510, 29.
- (13) Weinberger v. Inglis, [1918] 1 Ch. 517; 87 L.J.Ch. 345; 118 L.T. 769; affd. H.L., [1919] A.C. 606; 88 L.J.Ch. 287; 121 L.T. 65; 42 Digest 790, 14.
- (14) Scott v. Avery, (1856), 5 H.L. Cas. 811; 25 L.J.Ex. 308; 28 L.T.O.S. 207; 10 E.R. 1121; 16 Digest 115, 149. C
- (15) Czarnikow v. Roth, Schmidt & Co., [1922] 2 K.B. 478; 92 L.J.K.B. 81; 127 L.T. 824; 16 Digest 116, 151.
- (16) Re Raven, [1915] 1 Ch. 673; 84 L.J.Ch. 489; 113 L.T. 131; 8 Digest 303, 823.
- (17) Re Wynn's Will Trusts, [1952] 1 All E.R. 341. D
- (18) Labouchere v. Wharnccliffe (Earl), (1879), 13 Ch.D. 346; 41 L.T. 638; 8 Digest 509, 24.
- (19) Osgood v. Nelson, (1872), L.R. 5 H.L. 636; 10 B. & S. 119; 41 L.J.Q.B. 329; 13 Digest 317, 507.

APPEAL by the defendant guild from an order of ORMEROD, J., made on Dec. 14, 1951. E

The defendant guild was a society of showmen and a registered trade union formed to protect the rights and interests of showmen visiting fairs and show-grounds. The plaintiff was a travelling showman and at all material times a member of the guild. By a bye-law of the Yorkshire section committee of the guild no member of the guild should apply for the use of any position in a fair-ground which another member had occupied for two immediately previous consecutive years if such other member desired again to occupy that position. By r. 6 of the rules of the guild any member guilty of unruly conduct might be called before his section committee who had power to expel him from the guild. By r. 14 (a) the section committee had power to impose fines on any of its members breaking any of the provisions of the rules or bye-laws, and, if such fine was not paid within a month, the member was deemed to have ceased to be a member of the guild. Any member on whom a fine had been imposed by his section committee had the right of appeal to the central council of the guild. Rule 15 (c) provided: "No member of the guild shall indulge in unfair competition with regard to the renting, taking or letting of ground or position." By r. 26 all members of the guild had the option, at the termination of the war or before, of taking up their pre-war positions at all fairs, providing that the section committee was satisfied that the claim was justified. Rule 30 defined "the rules" as meaning and including the rules of the guild for the time being in force. F
G
H

Between 1934 and 1943 one William Shaw occupied a certain position (No. 2 site) at the Bradford summer fair, which was held on ground belonging to the Bradford Corporation. In 1945 and 1946 the position was occupied by the plaintiff. In 1947 there was no fair. In that year Shaw applied to the committee to have the option of again taking up his pre-war position at the fair, and on Aug. 19, 1947, the committee, acting under r. 26, granted to Shaw the right to take up his pre-war position. In 1948 the plaintiff arranged to occupy No. 2 site, but permitted Shaw to occupy it without prejudice to his (the plaintiff's) claim to be solely entitled to its occupation. On May 25, 1948, on a complaint by Shaw to the committee regarding the plaintiff's assertion of a right to occupy No. 2 site the committee, after hearing the plaintiff, decided that Shaw was entitled to occupy the site, and on June 7, 1948, on appeal to the appeal committee this decision was upheld. In 1949 the plaintiff occupied the position and Shaw again complained to the committee, in the following terms: "(2) I . . . herewith wish to make the following two complaints against Mr. Frank Lee, one under r. 15 (c) he occupied my Noah's Ark position with his Noah's Ark at Bradford fair, July, 1949, knowing the same had been given to me under r. 26 as he lodged an appeal against the section's decision and the section's decision was upheld and I occupied the position in 1948 with my Noah's Ark which had been granted to me. (3) I also wish to make a complaint against Mr. F. Lee under standing order No. 3 re Bradford fair, July, 1949, that he did violate the appeal committee's decision by occupying my Noah's Ark position with his Noah's Ark after I had been granted same by the appeal committee. He occupied the same position after having been asked three times whether he intended occupying same by the Yorkshire section committee and each time he said he was going to occupy same, this was before he started to build up." On Aug. 14, 1949, the committee decided that the case against the plaintiff had been proved, fined him £100, and instructed him to hand back the position to Shaw. On Oct. 12, 1949, the plaintiff having failed to pay the fine, the committee resolved that he was deemed to have ceased to be a member of the guild. The plaintiff claimed declarations, inter alia, (i) that the committee's decision of May 25, 1948, and that of the appeal committee on June 7, 1948, were ultra vires and void, (ii) that the plaintiff was not guilty of unfair competition, and (iii) that the decisions of the committee on Aug. 14, and Oct. 12, 1949, were ultra vires and the plaintiff was still a member of the guild. The plaintiff further claimed injunctions restraining, inter alia, the guild from excluding the plaintiff from the premises of the guild or preventing him from exercising his rights and privileges of membership of the guild. The defendant guild contended that the committee's decision that the plaintiff was guilty of unfair competition within r. 15 (c) was final and one with which the courts had no jurisdiction to interfere. ORMEROD, J., held that the plaintiff's conduct did not amount to unfair competition and that the fine and expulsion were ultra vires and void.

Sir Frank Soskice, Q.C., and Wingate-Saul for the guild.

Percy Lamb, Q.C., and Beaton for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 4. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J. [after stating the facts]: In this class of case it seems to me plain that the nature of the complaint should be clearly stated, and para. (2) of Mr. Shaw's complaint in 1949 seems to me to satisfy that test. The standing order referred to in para. (3) deals with appeal sub-committees and throws no light on the nature of the charge. It is on the face of it a charge that the plaintiff had violated a decision of the appeal committee. That does not, in my opinion, come within r. 14. Counsel for the defendant guild submitted that it should be regarded as a complaint of violating r. 26. There are two difficulties about this. First, it does not so state. Secondly, by this time r. 26 had ceased to exist as a rule, though it is not suggested that rights acquired under it did not remain in force. We were referred to the definition of "the rules" in r. 30. That does not, in my view, assist the argument. It was suggested that the violation of a committee's decision might be brought under r. 6. I express no opinion about that because quite plainly there was no charge as to a breach of r. 6. In my opinion, the only charge that falls to be considered is for a breach of r. 15 (c). Before the learned judge the case seems to have proceeded on the basis that that was a question for him on the facts which were really not in dispute. Before us counsel for the defendant guild, relying on a number of statements in reported cases, suggested that the committee's decision on the matter was final if, whatever the view of this court, the facts were such that the words of the rule might be applicable.

I will read the passage in which the learned judge dealt with this point:

"Because the plaintiff in 1948 allowed without prejudice Mr. Shaw to have the use of this site and because he properly thought he was entitled to it in 1949 and insisted on having it, I am asked to say that conduct of that kind amounts to unfair competition to bring him within r. 15 (c) of these rules. Even if that were all the rule said, I think I should have the greatest possible difficulty in finding that the action taken by the plaintiff on the occasion when the complaint arose was action which came within the wording of r. 15 (c), but I doubt very much whether on a reading of the whole of sub-r. (c) of that rule it deals or is intended to deal in any way with conduct of this kind. It appears to me that it is intended to deal almost entirely, if not entirely, with questions arising in the course of either under-cutting, on the one hand, or bribery by offering an increased rent on the other hand, and not unfair competition in the sense of one man saying: 'Whatever the committee's decision, I am entitled to the use of this site.' How I could hold or any other court could hold that the conduct of the plaintiff in these circumstances came within that rule I find it impossible to think, and I am satisfied it did not come within that rule."

Counsel for the defendant guild submitted that this was wrong. He put it in this way. He said quite rightly that the plaintiff and Mr. Shaw were competitors. There was competition for No. 2 site, which was, no doubt, the better site. The plaintiff in insisting on its use, notwithstanding the decision of the committee, was being unfair. Therefore, there was unfair competition. I do not think that, if the words "unfair competition" stood alone, they are apt to describe what happened here. It is often fallacious in considering the meaning of a phrase consisting of two words to find a meaning which each has separately and then infer that the two together cover the combination so arrived at. The two together may, as here, have acquired a special meaning of their own. In any event, the phrase here has to be read in the context of the rule, and I agree with the learned judge that so construed it is incapable of being applied to the plaintiff's conduct.

Counsel referred us to some cases dealing with the circumstances in which the court will interfere or will refrain from interfering with the decisions of a domestic tribunal. Before I refer to them it is right to say that there is no question here of any breach of what are called the principles of natural justice still less of malice or bad faith. The plaintiff was heard and the committee, I think, made praiseworthy efforts to try to get the trouble resolved. In considering statements in cases it is, I think, important to have in mind what was the subject-matter dealt with by the rule which was before the court. In Dawkins v. Antrobus (1) the court was concerned with the rule of a club which provided that, if the conduct of a member was "in the opinion of the committee . . . injurious to the character and interests of the club", he could, subject to a right of appeal to a general meeting, be expelled. BRETT, L.J., referred to the danger of the courts acting as courts of appeal from decisions of members of clubs. On the words and subject-matter in question the court considered, first, whether there was anything contrary to natural justice. Being satisfied that there was not, they then, as I read the judgments, proceeded on the basis that, being satisfied the decision was bona fide, the court would not further examine into the matter, although two of the lords justices indicated that they thought the decision reasonable. Although, of course, any rule or formula in one sense involves construing the words used, the question here was the opinion of a body of men on a question of the standards of propriety and conduct appropriate to members of a particular association. In considering in such a case whether the committee has acted intra vires, they will, perhaps, inevitably have done so if they have acted bona fide.

In Leeson v. General Council of Medical Education & Registration (2) and Allinson v. General Council of Medical Education & Registration (3) this court had, inter alia, to consider the words of s. 29 of the Medical Act, 1858:

"If any registered medical practitioner . . . shall after due inquiry be judged by the General Council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect, the General Council may, if they see fit, direct the registrar to erase the name of such medical practitioner from the register."

There are words in the judgment of COTTON, L.J., in Leeson's case (2), which suggest that, subject to the principles of natural justice, the court would only interfere if satisfied that the council had not acted honestly. BOWEN, L.J., proceeded on the same lines. Counsel for the guild relied on these judgments. In Allinson's case (3) the test is, as I read it, put more objectively. LORD ESHER, M.R., said ([1894] 1 Q.B. 761):

"Was the evidence, taken as a whole, reasonably capable of being treated by the council as bringing the plaintiff within that definition of 'infamous conduct in a professional respect'?"

LOPES, L.J., held (ibid. 763) that the court would not interfere if there was any evidence on which the council could reasonably have come to their decision. DAVEY, L.J., puts it in the same way at the conclusion of his judgment. In these cases the question was primarily one, not of construction, but of professional ethics.

In Maclean v. Workers' Union (4) MAUGHAM, J., had to consider a case in which the plaintiff had been expelled for committing a breach of the rules. The plaintiff maintained that in the circumstances of the case the committee could not be impartial. The plaintiff had attacked the committee. There was a long history of previous disputes. They were, therefore, it was said, biased in their conclusion to expel him and their decision was void. MAUGHAM, J., reviewed the decisions. He preferred the statements in Leeson's case (2) to those in Allinson's case (3). With respect, I prefer the latter, though it may be, on the subject-matter being considered in those cases, that the distinction is one without a difference. If a committee have held that "A" is established when there was no evidence on which they could so find, I think the court should interfere although they, the committee, may have honestly misconstrued the provisions under which they were purporting to act. The issue as raised in Maclean's case (4) does not, of course, arise in this appeal.

The decision in Young v. Ladies' Imperial Club (5) is as such, of no assistance. SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1920] 2 K.B. 535), stated that this court is not a court of appeal from the decisions of club committees, "... provided the committees are properly constituted and properly summoned, and deal with the matter in a way not contrary to the principles of natural justice."

I am sure the learned lord justice did not intend to exclude the rules, in considering the question whether the committee had acted ultra vires. In Amalgamated Society of Carpenters, Cabinet Makers & Joiners v. Braithwaite (6) the House of Lords, after disposing of the first defence based on s. 4 of the Trades Union Act, 1871, proceeded to consider a defence based on the construction and application of the rules. Although it would appear that a committee had regarded a breach of one of the rules as proved to their satisfaction, it would seem, at any rate to me, that they were a committee acting in an executive capacity and not as a domestic tribunal deciding a charge after hearing the party or parties charged. In any case there appears to have been no doubtful issue on the point with which we have to deal.

These cases, in my opinion, show that, even where the subject-matter is as it was in the medical cases, the courts will interfere if there is no evidence. In such a case the committee will have acted ultra vires. That, on the conclusion which I have already expressed, is sufficient to enable the plaintiff to hold the judgment which he obtained below.

This is a difficult and important branch of the law. I am alive, I hope, to the important and necessary work done by domestic tribunals normally with care, skill and fairness. I am also alive to the principle reiterated more than once that this court cannot be made a court of appeal from decisions of such tribunals. On the other hand, a power of expelling a member is a drastic power which in many cases, as here, may affect the plaintiff's livelihood, or reputation. There is, in my opinion, a distinction between cases where the decision challenged is under the rules based on the opinion of a committee on a matter which is primarily one of opinion, and those cases, such as the present, where the decision is, or should be, based primarily on the legal construction of words in a rule. The principles laid down in the former class of case are sufficient for the plaintiff here. I wish, however, to make it clear that, in my opinion, the principles laid down in those cases are not necessarily to be regarded as setting the limit to the jurisdiction of this court where the issue is one primarily of construction.

DENNING, L.J.: The jurisdiction of a domestic tribunal, such as the committee of the Showmen's Guild, must be founded on a contract, express or implied. Outside the regular courts of this country, no set of men can sit in judgment on their fellows except so far as Parliament authorises it or the parties agree to it. The jurisdiction of the committee of the Showmen's Guild is contained in a written set of rules to which all the members subscribe. This set of rules contains the contract between the members and is just as much subject to the jurisdiction of these courts as any other contract.

It was once said by SIR G. JESSEL, M.R., that the courts only intervened in these cases to protect rights of property: see Rigby v. Connol (7) (14 Ch. 487); and other judges have often said the same thing: see, for instance Cookson v. Harewood (8) ([1932] 2 K.B. 481 and 488). But FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., denied that there was any such limitation on the power of the courts: see Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (9) ([1911] 1 Ch. 562); and it has now become quite clear that he was right: see Abbott v. Sullivan (10). Abbott's case (10) shows that the power of this court to intervene is founded on its jurisdiction to protect rights of contract. If a member is expelled by a committee in breach of contract, this court will grant a declaration that their action is ultra vires. It will also grant an injunction to prevent his expulsion if that is necessary to protect a proprietary right of his, or to protect him in his right to earn his livelihood: see Amalgamated Society of Carpenters, Cabinet Makers & Joiners v. Braithwaite (6), but it will not grant an injunction to give a member the right to enter a social club, unless there are proprietary rights attached to it, because it is too personal to be specifically enforced: see Baird v. Wells (11) (44 Ch.D. 675, 676). That is, I think, the only relevance of rights of property in this connection. It goes to the form of remedy, not to the right.

Although the jurisdiction of a domestic tribunal is founded on contract, express or implied, nevertheless the parties are not free to make any contract they like. There are important limitations imposed by public policy. The tribunal must, for instance, observe the principles of natural justice. They must give the man notice of the charge and a reasonable opportunity of meeting it. Any stipulation to the contrary would be invalid. They cannot stipulate for a power to condemn a man unheard. That appears, I think, from the judgments of BRETT, L.J., in Dawkins v. Antrobus (1) (17 Ch.D. 630), of KELLY, C.B., in Wood v. Woad (12) (L.R. 9 Exch. 196), and of LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., in Weinberger v. Inglis (13) ([1919] A.C. 616), which are to be preferred to the dictum of MAUGHAM, J., in Maclean v. Workers' Union (4) to the contrary. Another limitation arises out of the well-known principle that parties cannot by contract oust the ordinary courts of their jurisdiction: see Scott v. Avery (14) (5 H.L. Cas. 845, 846) per ALDERSON, B., and LORD CRANWORTH, L.C. They can, of course, agree to leave questions of law, as well as questions of fact, to the decision of the domestic tribunal. They can, indeed, make the tribunal the final arbiter on questions of fact, but they cannot make it the final arbiter on questions of law. They cannot prevent its decisions being examined by the courts. If parties should seek, by agreement, to take the law out of the hands of the courts and into the hands of a private tribunal, without any recourse at all to the courts in case of error of law, then the agreement is to that extent contrary to public policy and void: see Czarnikow v. Roth, Schmidt & Co. (15) ([1922] 2 K.B. 488), Re Raven (16) and Re Wynn's Will Trusts (17).

The question in the present case is: To what extent will the courts examine the decisions of domestic tribunals on points of law? This is a new question which is not to be solved by turning to the club cases. In the case of social clubs the rules usually empower the committee to expel a member who, in their opinion, has been guilty of conduct detrimental to the club, and this is a matter of opinion and nothing else. The courts have no wish to sit on appeal from their decisions on such a matter any more than from the decisions of a family conference. They have nothing to do with social rights or social duties. On any expulsion they will see that there is fair play. They will see that the man has notice of the charge and a reasonable opportunity of being heard. They will see that the committee observe the procedure laid down by the rules, but will not otherwise interfere: see Labouchere v. Earl of Wharnccliffe (18), Dawkins v. Antrobus (1). It is very different with domestic tribunals which sit in judgment on the members of a trade or profession. They wield powers as great, if not greater, than any exercised by the courts of law. They can deprive a man of his livelihood. They can ban him from the trade in which he has spent his life and which is the only trade he knows. They are usually empowered to do this for any breach of their rules, which, be it noted, are rules which they impose and which he has no real opportunity of accepting or rejecting. In theory their powers are based on contract. The man is supposed to have contracted to give them these great powers, but in practice he has no choice in the matter. If he is to engage in the trade, he has to submit to the rules promulgated by the committee. Is such a tribunal to be treated by these courts on the same footing as a social club? I say: "No." A man's right to work is just as important, if not more important, to him than his rights of property. These courts intervene every day to protect rights of property. They must also intervene to protect the right to work.

But the question still remains: To what extent will the courts intervene? They will, I think, always be prepared to examine the decision to see that the tribunal have observed the law. This includes the correct interpretation of the rules. Let me give an illustration. If a domestic tribunal is given power by the rules to expel a member for misconduct, such as here for "unfair competition", does that mean that the tribunal is the sole judge of what constitutes unfair competition? Suppose they put an entirely wrong construction on the words "unfair competition" and find a member guilty of it when no reasonable person could so find, has not the man a remedy? I think he has, for the simple reason that he has only agreed to the committee exercising jurisdiction according to the true interpretation of the rules, and not according to a wrong interpretation. Take this very case. If the man is found guilty of unfair competition, the committee can impose a fine on him of a sum up to £250. Then, if he has not the money to pay, or, at any rate, does not pay, within one month, the man automatically ceases to be a member of the guild: see r. 14. To be deprived of membership in this way is a very severe penalty on a man. It means that he will be excluded from all the fair grounds of the country which are controlled by the guild or its members: see r. 11 (g) (ii) and r. 15 (a). This is a serious encroachment on his right to earn a livelihood, and it is, I think, not to be permitted unless justified by the contract into which he has entered. These courts have never allowed a master to dismiss a servant except in accordance with the terms of the contract between them. So also they cannot permit a domestic tribunal to deprive a member of his livelihood or to injure him in it, unless the contract, on its true construction, gives them power to do so. I repeat "on its true construction" because I desire to emphasize that the true construction of the contract is to be decided by these courts and by no one else. Counsel for the defendant guild argued that it was for the committee of the guild to construe the rules, and, so long as they put an honest construction on them, then their construction was binding on the members, even though it was a wrong construction. I cannot agree with this contention. The rules are the contract between the members. The committee cannot extend their jurisdiction by giving a wrong interpretation to the contract, no matter how honest they may be. They have only such jurisdiction as the contract on its true interpretation confers on them, not what they think it confers. The scope of their jurisdiction is a matter for the courts, and not for the parties, let alone for one of them. This is how the House of Lords approached the problem in the Carpenters' case (6), and I think we should follow their example.

In most of the cases that come before such a domestic tribunal the task of the committee can be divided into two parts—(i) they must construe the rules; (ii) they must apply the rules to the facts. The first is a question of law which they must answer correctly if they are to keep within their jurisdiction. The second is a question of fact which is essentially a matter for them. The whole point of giving jurisdiction to a committee is so that they can determine the facts and decide what is to be done about them. The two parts of the task are, however, often inextricably mixed together. The construction of the rules is so bound up with the application of the rules to the facts that no one can tell one from the other. When that happens, the question whether the committee has acted within its jurisdiction depends, in my opinion, on whether the facts adduced before them were reasonably capable of being held to be a breach of the rules. If they were, then the proper inference is that the committee correctly construed the rules and have acted within their jurisdiction. If, however, the facts were not reasonably capable of being held to be a breach and yet the committee held them to be a breach, then the only inference is that the committee have misconstrued the rules and exceeded their jurisdiction. The proposition is sometimes stated in the form that the court can interfere if there was no evidence to support the finding of the committee, but that only means that the facts were not reasonably capable of supporting the finding.

We were referred to a number of cases on statutory tribunals. These are not directly in point, because a statute can, expressly or by implication, exclude the jurisdiction of the courts, whereas parties cannot do so. Nevertheless, in cases where the jurisdiction is not excluded, the courts have intervened on the same principles as I have mentioned. The cases show that, although Parliament has given a tribunal power to deprive a man of his livelihood for a particular cause, nevertheless the courts will intervene if there is a real substantial miscarriage of justice with regard to him, and they will hold there is a miscarriage of justice if the facts adduced before the tribunal are not reasonably capable of supporting the charge made against him. Thus, where an Act stated that a tribunal might remove a registrar for "any cause which may appear reasonable to the tribunal", all the judges of England were of opinion that the courts would take care to see that the cause was a real and substantial cause. There must, it was held, be sufficient evidence to go to a jury on it: see Osgood v. Nelson (19) (10 B. & S., 156, 164, 167, and L.R. 5 H.L. 646-654). So, also, when the General Medical Council were empowered to remove a medical man for "infamous conduct", it was held by this court that the facts before them must be reasonably capable of being so considered: Allinson's case (3) ([1894] 1 Q.B. 761, per LORD ESHER, M.R.). It has sometimes been said in these cases that absence of evidence is not itself a ground for the intervention of the court, but only goes to show bad faith in the tribunal: see Leeson's case (2) (43 Ch.D. 377, 384) and Maclean v. Workers' Union (4) ([1929] 1 Ch. 623); but I do not think those statements can stand in the light of Osgood v. Nelson (19) which was not cited to the court in either case. Those cases, it is true, concerned statutory tribunals, but I see no reason why the power of the court to intervene should be any less in the case of domestic tribunals. In each case it is a question of interpretation, in the one of a statute, in the other of the rules, in order to see whether the tribunal have observed the law. In the case of statutory tribunals, the injured party has a remedy by certiorari, and also a remedy by declaration and injunction. The remedy by certiorari does not lie to domestic tribunals, but the remedy by declaration and injunction does lie and it can be equally effective, if not more effective than certiorari. It is, indeed, more effective because it is not subject to the limitation that the error must appear on the face of the record.

My conclusion, therefore, is that the court has power in this case to intervene in the decision of the committee of the Showmen's Guild if no facts were adduced before them which could reasonably be considered to be "unfair competition" within r. 15 (c) which says that

"No member of the guild shall indulge in unfair competition with regard to the renting, taking or letting of ground or position."

The facts are not in dispute. In May, 1949, the plaintiff and Mr. Shaw applied to the Bradford Corporation for a site on the fair ground for the Bradford Moor Fair. No allocations were made by the corporation before the two showmen arrived on the ground, but when they got there, it was found that the best position had been allotted to the plaintiff. Mr. Shaw then claimed that, in accordance with a previous ruling of the guild, he was entitled to the position. The corporation thought that the plaintiff was entitled to it, but they were quite ready to allow the showmen to decide between themselves. But the plaintiff said that, as the corporation had allotted it to him, he was going to stand on it. The learned judge held that there was nothing of "unfair competition" in the plaintiff's conduct and I agree with him. It may have been very reprehensible of him not to abide by the previous ruling of the guild. He should have given way to Mr. Shaw, but he can hardly be said to have been guilty of unfair competition. There was no undercutting or anything of that sort. He only accepted the position allotted to him and stood on it. Inasmuch as the facts are not reasonably capable of being "unfair competition" it follows that the committee had no jurisdiction to find him guilty of it.

There was another charge suggested though not clearly made against the plaintiff, namely, that he failed to observe the previous ruling of the committee which awarded Mr. Shaw the site. That ruling had been given in June, 1948, under r. 26 of the 1948 rules, and if that rule had been in existence in 1949, it may be that the plaintiff could have been found guilty of evading it. But it was not in existence in 1949. It had been repealed, and it is difficult to see how the plaintiff could be guilty of evading a rule which had ceased to exist. That was, no doubt, the reason why he was not charged with evading it. I do not stay to consider whether the plaintiff could have been charged with "unruly conduct" under r. 6. That was not before the committee, and is, therefore, not before us. The only real question before us is whether, on the admitted facts, the plaintiff could properly be found guilty of "unfair competition" within r. 15 (c). I agree with the judge that he could not. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

ROMER, L.J.: In the case of trade unions such as the defendant guild the rules constitute a contract which are binding on the members and are enforceable against them. The plaintiff, accordingly, on joining the union became bound to observe the rules which were for the time being in force and which regulated matters as between the executive and the members and as between the members themselves. This obligation, however, carried with it the corresponding right of remaining a member unless and until he forfeited that right by conduct which, under the rules, justified his expulsion from the guild. In general this right to continued membership of a trade union is of vital importance to men who join it and expulsion from the union may well result in the loss to a man of his only known means of livelihood. It is a right which the courts recognise and will not hesitate, in proper circumstances, to protect.

The plaintiff in this case, Mr. Lee, having been expelled from the defendant guild, comes to what are, prima facie, the proper tribunals in this country for the redress of grievances, namely, Her Majesty's courts, and seeks to establish that his expulsion was wrongful and to have his right to continued membership of the guild recognised and affirmed. He was met before us (though not, apparently, before the learned judge below) with the contention that he has no right to resort to the courts on this matter inasmuch as he is bound under the rules to accept as final and binding the decision of the domestic tribunal which adjudicated on his case, and that that tribunal is the sole and decisive arbiter of his fate. The particular provision on which this contention is based is r. 14 (a), which has already been read and which I will not read again. There can be no question but that the plaintiff, by virtue of this rule, has, on the face of it, agreed to accept the decision of the relevant tribunal on such matters as properly come within the scope of its jurisdiction. On any question, however, that is outside that scope he is free to come to the courts. The first question, therefore, to be considered is whether the decision which resulted in disciplinary action being taken against the plaintiff was or was not one which lay within the exclusive province of the tribunal. I will not re-state the controversy which arose at Bradford or the part which the plaintiff played in it. Suffice it to say that he conceived that he had a right under a bye-law passed in 1941 to a certain pitch at the fair which was claimed by a man named Shaw and carried his assertion of that right to the point of defying a contrary ruling by the properly constituted representatives of the guild. A domestic tribunal (hereinafter referred to as "the committee") was convened to consider the affair and on the facts (which were substantially not in dispute) that tribunal held that the plaintiff's conduct infringed r. 15 (c) which forbids members of the guild from indulging in unfair competition. This finding sufficiently furnished (as the committee thought) the necessary condition precedent to action under r. 14 (a), and that action, which took the form of fining, and subsequently expelling, the plaintiff, was accordingly taken. The plaintiff says that the committee's decision was wrong (in which I agree with him), but the question for the moment is whether it is open to him to come to the courts and say so.

The question whether a member of a community is in breach of a rule which he has agreed shall be binding on him may be purely factual, or may be one partly of fact and partly of law, or may be one purely of construction of the rule, in which case it is wholly a question of law. In my judgment, the inquiry on which the committee embarked in the present case came within the third of these categories for no question of fact was really in dispute. There was no doubt about what had happened at Bradford and it was the aim of the plaintiff, not to deny his actions, but to justify them. All, therefore, that the committee had to do was to determine whether those actions came within the prohibition imposed on members by r. 15 (c). Its primary and only task, accordingly, was to interpret the meaning and effect of that sub-rule or, as lawyers say, to construe it.

Did, then, the plaintiff, when he joined the guild, agree to accept as final and binding the decision of the committee on questions that might arise as to the construction of the rules? I leave aside for the moment the question whether he would be bound in law by any such agreement, but did he in fact agree? Such an agreement might have unfortunate, and even disastrous, results. There are few questions in the legal sphere which call for a higher degree of skill and experience in those who approach them than questions arising from the construction of documents. Such problems come almost daily before the courts and can in many cases only be solved by the proper application of principles which have been gradually evolved and of which the average layman has never heard. Even with a knowledge of such principles the task is frequently difficult and it is one for which a lay tribunal is singularly unfitted to deal. In these circumstances I should require the use of clear language before I was satisfied that members of any body such as the defendant guild had agreed to leave exclusively to a domestic tribunal powers which it had neither the knowledge nor experience to use and which, if misused (however honestly), might have such serious consequences for the members. I can find no such language in r. 14. The defendants' argument is that any member can be fined and expelled under this rule if he breaks a rule as construed by the committee even though, on its true construction, he has not broken it at all. The short answer to this contention, as it seems to me, is that r. 14 does not say so. If the rule had provided that members who "in the opinion" or "in the judgment" of the committee broke the regulations, then the plaintiff might, on this aspect of the case, have found himself in a difficulty. That qualification does not, however, appear. The condition precedent to the taking of action under r. 14 is that a member should have broken the rules, and that, in my opinion, means according to what they really mean and not according to what the committee think they mean. It is provided in sub-r. (b) of r. 14 that the decision of an appeal committee is to be taken as final as regards any member who appeals to them, and I am willing to assume (although it does not expressly say so) that the decision of the subordinate committee is also to be final if a member does not appeal. Even so, the condition precedent remains, and there is no sufficient indication in the rule that the committee are to be the final interpreters of the rules which constitute the contract into which the members of the guild have entered. If they attribute to a rule a meaning which it does not bear and then punish a man for breach of the rule as so construed, they are assuming a jurisdiction which they do not possess if the man has conformed to the rule on its proper interpretation, and I can find nothing in r. 14 to suggest that such a man has contracted out from applying to the court to determine whether, on the true construction of the rule which he is said to have broken, he has broken it in fact.

So far as I am aware, there is nothing in any of the decided cases which conflicts with the view which I have expressed. It certainly does not conflict with what I may call "the club cases": see, for example, Dawkins v. Antrobus (1). Two elements of importance distinguish those cases from this. First, by the rules in the club cases by which the members agreed to be bound, it was expressly provided that the test of expulsion was whether "in the opinion of" the domestic forum the conduct of a member warranted it, and, secondly, the decision on which the intervention of the courts was unsuccessfully sought were questions of ethics and not of law. Such questions are peculiarly within the province of the committee of a social club and it is now well established that the courts will not interfere even with unreasonable decisions provided that the committee has not acted dishonestly or in excess of jurisdiction in arriving at them. We were also referred to cases such as Leeson's case (2) and Allinson's case (3). In those cases the powers of the medical disciplinary body, the General Medical Council, were under discussion. Such powers are conferred by statute (and not, as in the club cases, by the members themselves) and under them the name of a medical practitioner can be erased from the register if after due inquiry he is judged by the general council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any professional respect. Accordingly, as in the club cases, a domestic tribunal, peculiarly qualified for the task, is established whose duty it is to inquire into questions of conduct and arrive at a conclusion on them. Parliament has entrusted the General Medical Council with this duty in substitution for the courts. Appeals to the courts in the medical cases, as in the club cases, have been in relation to decisions on ethical, not legal, questions, and the considerations which, and which alone, will warrant the intervention of the courts have been stated in not dissimilar terms.

In truth, I think that neither the club nor the medical cases, or the grounds on which they were decided, are of much assistance in the case that is now before us. The expulsions complained of in those cases depended on matters which lay within the exclusive competence of the domestic tribunals to decide whereas in the present case the plaintiff's expulsion depended on a matter which, in my view, the committee had no exclusive competence to decide, namely, the interpretation or construction of the rules. Further, in neither the club cases nor the medical cases has the question been raised or decided whether resort to the courts will be entertained where the opinion or judgment of the domestic tribunal has been on a question of law as distinct from a question of personal conduct. Of greater relevance to the present question, as I think, are cases in which the courts have exercised their power to adjudicate on rights contractually acquired notwithstanding the conferment of such power on domestic and untrained bodies. An example of this is the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters, Cabinet Makers & Joiners v. Braithwaite (6). In that case the rules of the appellant trade union included a rule (32) which provided that it should be competent for any managing committee, district council, branch committee, or branch at a special quarterly meeting "to fine . . . or expel any member from the society upon satisfactory proof that such member . . . [was] working on a co-partnership system when such system makes provision for the operatives holding only a minority of the shares in the concern."

The power of expulsion was, accordingly, exercisable under the rule if it had been proved to the satisfaction of the relevant tribunal that a member was so working. The respondents (members of the society) joined a co-partnership scheme inaugurated by Lever Brothers, Ltd. and the appellant society issued instructions to the effect that any member of the society who participated in this scheme must be excluded from the society in accordance with the general rules. The respondents obtained from the Court of Appeal (who reversed the decision of EVE, J.) a perpetual injunction restraining the society from expelling them from the society on the ground that their participation in the scheme justified their expulsion under r. 32. Now, although, presumably, the society, in acting on that rule, found it proved to its satisfaction that the respondents were working on a co-partnership of the nature described in the rule before it issued instructions for the expulsion of the respondents, it did not, apparently, rely on that fact as a bar to the respondents' action either in the Court of Appeal or the House of Lords. The society sought to defeat the respondents' action partly on the ground that it was precluded by s. 4 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, and partly on the ground that r. 32 justified the expulsion. The House of Lords (affirming the Court of Appeal) rejected the contention based on the Act and then proceeded to consider whether participation in the Lever Brothers scheme did or did not transgress the relevant part of r. 32. This (as sufficiently appears from the speech of LORD WRENBURY ([1922] 2 A.C. 471, 472) was a mixed question of fact and construction and the House was in no way deterred from considering it merely because of the jurisdiction which the rule gave to the society. Their Lordships in fact decided this question in the respondents' favour, and thus, in effect, overruled the society's decision on the matter. Another decision of the House of Lords which may usefully be referred to in this connection is Osgood v. Nelson (19).

For the above reasons I am satisfied that the plaintiff is in no way debarred from asking the court to say that the committee mis-construed r. 15 (c) and to contend that on its true construction nothing that he did at Bradford was in breach of its provisions. I have already indicated that, in my opinion, the committee did mis-interpret the rule, and on this point I entirely agree with the view which the learned judge expressed. It was argued for the defendant guild that, in asserting his right to the coveted pitch on the fair ground, the plaintiff unfairly competed with Shaw in the "taking" of that pitch. In my judgment, this is attributing to the sub-rule an effect which goes far beyond its terms. If "A" and "B" claim the right to occupy the same position on a ground it might be said that in a sense they were "competing" for that position. Assuming (though I do not accept the assumption) that that kind of competition was "competition" within the meaning of the rule, when does it become "unfair"? If the appropriate authority decides that "A" is right, it follows that "B" is wrong, but it cannot be said that "B" was unfair in advancing his claim. A plaintiff who unsuccessfully sues to establish his title to land may be ill-advised, obstinate, or even pig-headed, but it is difficult to see how he could legitimately be charged with unfairness. In the present case the plaintiff was setting up a claim under the bye-law of 1941 in answer to Shaw's claim under r. 26. In that endeavour he failed, but I agree with the learned judge that his action did not constitute "unfair competition" even if one takes the first sentence of r. 15 (c) by itself. When, however, one looks at the rest of the sub-rule—and the meaning of a part can only be ascertained by a consideration of the whole—it becomes abundantly plain that the prohibition which the rule imposes is against competition of quite a different kind from that which arises when there are rival claimants to a site. Every provision in r. 15 (c) which follows the first sentence constitutes an exception to, or qualification of, or an express inclusion in, a general rule. If a general rule is couched in equivocal terms light may well be thrown on the meaning which it was intended to bear by provisos that are subsequently engrafted upon it. In r. 15 (c) the general rule is stated in the first sentence and prohibits "unfair competition" in the renting, taking or letting of ground or position. This is followed by provisions to the effect that certain acts shall not be, and that other acts shall be, regarded as breaches of the general rule. Each of these acts is characterised by the feature of undercutting or bribery and each of these features is characteristic of the ordinary conception of unfair competition. From this it is a very legitimate inference that the general rule is one which prohibits competition between members by means of undercutting or bribery or by acts analogous thereto. The plaintiff never broke this rule and, as he was never charged with a breach of any other rule, it cannot be postulated of him that he came within that category of members against whom and against whom alone, the committee, under the provisions of r. 14 (a), had authority to act. I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiff has not contractually ousted the jurisdiction of the courts to entertain his action, and that, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, he is entitled to the relief which was granted to him in the court below.

I am, accordingly, of the opinion that the appeal fails. I would, however, like to say a word or two as to what the position would have been, in my view, if the defendant guild had succeeded in establishing that the effect of r. 14 (a) was to vest in the committee the exclusive power of interpreting the rules and that the plaintiff had contractually debarred himself from resorting to the courts even though the committee adopted a palpably erroneous construction of a rule. I hesitate to express a concluded view on this point, partly because it does not arise if I am right in thinking that the powers of the committee under r. 14 (a) are not such as the defendant guild claim them to be and partly because it was not argued before us. It seems to me, however, as at present advised, that on the hypothesis which I have suggested it is at least possible that the courts would hold that the plaintiff's agreement to accept as final decisions of the committee on the construction of the rules was not binding on him. The proper tribunals for the determination of legal disputes in this country are the courts and they are the only tribunals which, by training and experience, and assisted by properly qualified advocates, are fitted for the task. The courts jealously uphold and safeguard the prima facie privilege of every man to resort to them for the determination and enforcement of his legal rights. As an example of this it has been held that any attempt by a testator to divert from the courts the power of deciding questions of construction that may arise on his will and vesting that power in his executors instead will fail: Re Raven (16), Re Wynn's Will Trusts (17). Directions of this kind by testators will be disregarded partly on the ground that they are contrary to public policy as being attempts to oust the jurisdiction of the courts, and partly as being repugnant to the benefits conferred by the will on the beneficiaries. If the cases to which I have referred were rightly decided, as I think they were, it may well be that the same considerations of public policy which act as a fetter on testamentary attempts to oust the jurisdiction of the courts on questions of law would defeat contractual attempts to bring about the same result, and more especially, perhaps, where the contract is contained in trade union rules to which members of the union are virtually bound to subscribe. I will only add that passages in the judgments of this court in Czarnikow v. Roth, Schmidt & Co. (15) lend support, as I think, to the view that if r. 14 (a) had the force and effect which the defendant guild has suggested should be attributed to it the courts would not recognise as binding the attempted ouster of jurisdiction which would be thereby involved.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: J. H. Milner & Son (for the guild); Stafford Clark & Co., agents for G. E. Hutchinson, Huddersfield (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRIES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), April 1, 2, 1952.]

Court of Appeal—Hearing in camera.

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Realisation of assets—Desirability of ascertaining views of contributories.

PER SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: Notwithstanding that a matter was heard at first instance in chambers, to justify the Court of Appeal in sitting in camera it must be shown plainly that otherwise the ends of justice would be liable to be defeated within the principle laid down in Scott v. Scott ([1913] A.C. 417). The Court of Appeal has no power to sit in chambers.

The only assets of a public limited company, A. Ltd., were forty-nine per cent. of the shares of a private limited company, W. Ltd. An order was made for the winding-up of A. Ltd., and the liquidator entered into an agreement (conditional on the approval of the court) with the holder of the majority of the shares in W. Ltd., for the sale to him of the minority holding. Certain contributories of A. Ltd., desired the liquidator to apply to the court to have W. Ltd., wound-up in order that proceedings might be taken against the directors. The liquidator refused.

PER SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I have not been impressed by the suggestion that the contributories cannot be expected to form an opinion on such a matter themselves. They are the persons solely concerned, and, however well founded may be the liquidator in his opinion, it is wrong to deny the contributories an opportunity, if they wish, even of throwing good money after bad.

AS TO HEARING IN CAMERA, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 8, p. 526, para. 1167; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 16, pp. 128-131, Nos. 259-289.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Scott v. Scott, [1913] A.C. 417; 82 L.J.P. 74; 109 L.T. 1; 16 Digest 31, 301.
- (2) Mellor v. Thompson, (1885), 31 Ch.D. 55; 55 L.J.Ch. 942; 54 L.T. 219; 16 Digest 130, 282.
- (3) Re London & Globe Finance Corp'n., Ltd., [1903] 1 Ch. 728; 72 L.J.Ch. 368; 88 L.T. 194; 10 Digest 985, 6819.

APPEALS by leave of VAISEY, J., by certain contributories of Agricultural Industries, Ltd., from orders of VAISEY, J., dated Mar. 10, 1952, made in the winding-up proceedings of the said company.

By the said orders, VAISEY, J., (i) sanctioned a conditional agreement made by the liquidator of the company for the sale of forty-nine per cent. of the shares held by the said company in W. Dennis & Sons, Ltd., to the holder of the majority of the shares in the latter company; and (ii) refused an application by the said contributories for an order on the liquidator to take steps to effect the liquidation of W. Dennis & Sons, Ltd. On appeal counsel for the applicants asked that the case be heard in camera on the ground that otherwise the proposed defendants would obtain advance information of the case and evidence against them.

Only two preliminary matters discussed in the Court of Appeal call for a report. The facts, so far as relevant, appear in the headnote.

Pennyquick, Q.C., and A. F. M. Berkeley for the applicants, the contributories objecting to the proposed sale.

Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and Raymond Walton for the liquidator.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: Before I proceed to state the conclusion at which I have arrived there are two preliminary matters to which I wish to refer. We were asked to hear this case in camera, and, possibly, it appeared to be thought that wherever a case is heard in chambers by the judge below, prima facie the case should not be heard in open court in the Court of Appeal. It is, I think, desirable to observe that the Court of Appeal has no power to sit in chambers, but according to the Rules of the Supreme Court certain matters are referred to the judge in chambers, and they are not heard in public, whatever be the nature of the particular case. To justify this court closing its doors and thereby making an exception to what is fundamental in the administration of justice in this country, viz., that it should not be done behind closed doors, it must be shown that, as laid down by the House of Lords in Scott v. Scott (1), the ends of justice would otherwise be liable to be defeated. In this case it was necessary to consider whether it would be proper to take certain steps which would or might end in litigation against a certain individual, and during the early part of the argument attention was drawn to a case in this court in which it was said that, if the result might be to render futile, by disclosing what steps were going to be taken, any relief which might be had, then it would be proper for the Court of Appeal to hear the case in camera: Mellor v. Thompson (2). Counsel for the applicants did not suggest that he could put the matter so high when he asked us to hear it in camera, but we thought, with our then imperfect knowledge of what was going to be discussed, that in the circumstances we should hear the matter in camera, at any rate to start with. During the discussion which followed MORRIS, L.J., referred to Re London & Globe Finance Corp'n., Ltd. (3), in which consideration was given to the question whether criminal proceedings should be taken against the late Mr. Whitaker Wright. BUCKLEY, J., refused the application to hear the case in camera. I have made these statements because I think it is undesirable prima facie that matters which come to the Court of Appeal should be heard in camera, unless it is made plain that the conditions in Scott v. Scott (1) are satisfied. Having heard the arguments, we have now thought it proper that the court should be opened for the purpose of delivering the judgments of the court.

The second preliminary matter to which I should like to make a reference is this. The case is one of great complexity. The history covers a period of a generation and concerns the transactions of a number of persons, including the somewhat ominous names of Mr. Gerard Lee Bevan and Mr. Clarence Hatry. The liquidator, who has resisted the application made in this case, is an extremely distinguished chartered accountant, and nobody has suggested, or could for a moment suggest, that he has acted otherwise than to the best of his very considerable professional skill, or that he has not, in negotiating this agreement, done what he has regarded as the best for the estate, and I am far from suggesting that he is not right. Nevertheless, it ought not to be forgotten that the persons solely concerned in this matter are the contributories. They have, either themselves or through their predecessors, been in the unhappy position of having taken shares in Agricultural Industries, Ltd., thirty years ago on the faith of promises of a most rash character put before them in the offer to the public. They have never, save on one occasion right at the beginning, received any return whatsoever in respect of those shares, and they may reasonably take the view that, having had nothing for so long, there would be much to be said, if prospects were at all promising in their opinion, for risking something in an attempt, at long last, to regain what they have lost. I have not been impressed by the suggestion that in a matter of this sort the persons concerned cannot be expected to form an opinion on the matter themselves. I think that, however well founded may be the liquidator in his opinion, it is quite wrong to deny to the persons really concerned an opportunity, if they wish to do it, even of throwing good money after bad. It is for them to decide. I think that in this case it was unfortunate that no step was taken to ascertain the views of the contributories (other than a gentleman who is himself a very large contributory) on the question whether they did desire to try to recover, through a liquidation of W. Dennis & Sons, Ltd., some of the money that had been lost.

[HIS LORDSHIP added that, on the facts, it was now too late for the liquidator to adopt that course. HIS LORDSHIP then stated the history of Agricultural Industries, Ltd., and said that the only assets of that company were forty-nine per cent. of the shares in the private company, W. Dennis & Sons, Ltd. The question which he had to consider was what were the chances of the private company's being put into liquidation on a petition presented by the liquidator as representing the holders of forty-nine per cent. of the shares. Counsel had suggested that the company would be wound-up under the "just and equitable" provision of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 222 (f). HIS LORDSHIP was not satisfied that the assets of the private company, when sold, would afford the contributories of Agricultural Industries, Ltd., substantially more than they would receive by the proposed sale of the shares in the private company. Moreover, there was no evidence that the holders of the minority of the shares in the private company (i.e., the contributories of Agricultural Industries, Ltd.) had been oppressed by the holders of the majority. Counsel for the applicants had based himself on certain turgid transactions which occurred between 1919 and 1925, but those matters were very stale. The chances that would attend an attempt to wind-up the private company must, in HIS LORDSHIP's view, be regarded as speculative and hazardous, and there was no reason to disturb the conclusions to which, in his discretion, VAISEY, J., had come.

JENKINS, L.J., and MORRIS, L.J., agreed.]

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Ballantynes (for the applicants); Slaughter & May (for the liquidator).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

STEWART v. REAVELL'S GARAGE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), March 4, 5, 6, 7, April 7, 1952.]

Contract—Implied term—Duty to supply good work and materials—Purpose made known to contractor—Reliance on skill and judgment—Execution by sub-contractor contemplated—Contractor's advice on materials and sub-contractor accepted—Contractor's liability for unsuitable materials and sub-contractor's faulty work.

A motorist with no technical or engineering knowledge, but a good knowledge of his car, a Bentley speed model with powerful brakes, took it to experienced car repairers to have the brake-drums re-lined. Knowing this was specialist's work which they did not undertake, he suggested it should be done by a firm who advertised cast-iron linings which, he said, would be preferable because they would consist of an unwelded circle of metal. The price quoted by that firm being considered high, the car repairers, with the plaintiff's consent, obtained a lower quotation from another firm who advocated fitting alloy steel linings. In recommending the acceptance of this quotation the repairers omitted to inform the motorist that alloy steel linings involved welding. The second firm did the work as sub-contractors of the car repairers, but the alloy steel linings were not suitable for the brake-drums and the car was damaged in consequence.

HELD: the motorist having so made known to the repairers that he required the brake-drum linings for a car designed for speed as to show that he relied on their skill and judgment to ensure that the brakes were repaired in a suitable and efficient manner, notwithstanding that he had approved the employment of specified sub-contractors the repairers were under a duty to provide good workmanship, materials of good quality, and a braking system fit for its purpose, and not merely to employ competent sub-contractors.

Dictum of LORD WRIGHT in Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze & Brass Co., Ltd. ([1934] A.C. 423), and dictum of DU PARCQ, J., in G. H. Myers & Co. v. Brent Cross Service Co. ([1934] 1 K.B. 55), applied.

AS TO DUTY OF PERSON EMPLOYED UNDER CONTRACT OF WORK AND LABOUR, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 465-467, paras. 529-534; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 1300, 1301, Nos. 56-62.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze & Brass Co., Ltd., [1934] A.C. 402; 103 L.J.K.B. 289; 151 L.T. 142; Digest Supp.
- (2) Myers (G. H.) & Co. v. Brent Cross Service Co., [1934] 1 K.B. 46; 103 L.J.K.B. 123; 150 L.T. 96; Digest Supp.
- (3) Edwards v. Newland, [1950] 1 All E.R. 1072; [1950] 2 K.B. 534; 2nd Digest Supp.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract and for negligence, and counterclaim for charges for work done.

The plaintiff was a motorist with no technical or engineering knowledge. He took his car, a 1929 Bentley speed model with powerful brakes, to the defendants, an experienced firm of car repairers to whom the car was well known, to have the brake-drums and the brake-shoes re-lined. Re-lining of the brake-drums involved placing inside each drum, by shrinking and pressure fitting, a sleeve of metal so as to give a new surface to the braking face on which the shoes applied their force, and the plaintiff knew that this was a specialist's work which the defendants did not undertake. He suggested that it should be done by a firm who advertised cast-iron linings for Bentley brake-drums, and informed the defendants that a cast-iron sleeve, which would be cut from a tube with no weld, so forming an unwelded circle of metal, would be preferable. The price quoted by the firm of brake liners proved too high, and the plaintiff agreed to a further quotation being obtained from another firm, Re-Lined Brake-Drums, Ltd., who also normally did that kind of work for the defendants. That firm, in submitting their quotation, said they advocated the fitting of an alloy steel lining. The defendants recommended that Re-Lined Brake-Drums, Ltd., should do the work, and the plaintiff accepted their advice without knowing that this method involved welding. Re-Lined Brake-Drums, Ltd., did the work as sub-contractors of the defendants, and the re-lined brake-drums were fitted and tested by the defendants. When the plaintiff was driving the car to London on the day after it was delivered to him, he applied the brakes gently and reasonably when travelling at sixty miles an hour. There was a violent noise and vibration, and the car swung quickly to the right, mounted the off-side of the road, struck a tree and overturned on its near side. The plaintiff contended that the accident was due to a faulty brake-drum lining, that it was an implied term of the contract that the defendants would exercise all proper care and skill in the work and would use materials suitable thereto, and that they would carefully test the operation of the brakes before delivery of the car to the plaintiff so as to ensure that they were working properly and were accurately adjusted so as to be safe for use by the plaintiff. He said that the responsibility of the defendants extended to the work of sub-contractors even though it was contemplated that certain specified sub-contractors should be employed. The defendants submitted that in respect of the work in question they were only under a duty to take reasonable care to employ suitable sub-contractors and were not liable for the default of the latter, but were entitled to assume without detailed examination that their work would be satisfactory.

R. T. Monier-Williams for the plaintiff.

P. M. O'Connor for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 7. SELLERS, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts; found that the accident was due to the lining on the off-side front brake-drum having come away from the drum, that the plaintiff was not negligent in driving the car at the time of the accident, that the defendants were not negligent in fitting the brake-drums as returned from the sub-contractors, or in re-lining the brake-shoes or in the assembling, adjustment, and compensation of the brakes or the testing after assembly, that a strip metal lining was unsatisfactory for the brake-drums, that the fitting of the lining to the off-side brake-drum by the sub-contractors was not done properly, and that the defendants would be able to establish a breach of contract by the sub-contractors, who were not parties to the action; and continued: The somewhat difficult question of the liability of the defendants depends on the terms, expressed or implied, of the contract, and must be determined on their true effect. This was not a contract for the sale of goods to which s. 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, could be applied. It was a contract for work done and materials supplied. Into that type of contract there may also be implied an absolute warranty of fitness for the intended purpose, if the circumstances show that the particular purpose is made known to the repairer and that the work of repair is of the type which the repairer holds himself out to perform either by himself or others as his sub-contractors, and, no less important, if the circumstances show that the purpose was made known so as to show that the customer relied on the repairer's skill and judgment in the matter.

I would adapt to this kind of contract some words of LORD WRIGHT which state the standard of proof in a case of the sale of goods in Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze & Brass Co., Ltd. (1) ([1934] A.C. 423). The standard of proof is equally applicable to the present case. Such a reliance must be affirmatively shown. The customer must bring home to the mind of the repairer that he is relying on him in such a way that the repairer can be taken to have contracted on that footing. The reliance is to be the basis of a contractual obligation. There is a passage in the judgment of DU PARCQ, J., in G. H. Myers & Co. v. Brent Cross Service Co. (2), which provides a concise statement of the law applicable ([1934] 1 K.B. 55):

" . . . I think that the true view is that a person contracting to do work and supply materials warrants that the materials which he uses will be of good quality and reasonably fit for the purpose for which he is using them, unless the circumstances of the contract are such as to exclude any such warranty. There may be circumstances which would clearly exclude it. A man goes to a repairer and says: 'Repair my car; get the parts from the makers of the car and fit them'. In such a case it is made plain that the person ordering the repairs is not relying upon any warranty except that the parts used will be parts ordered and obtained from the makers. On the other hand, if he says 'Do this work, fit any necessary parts', then he is in no way limiting the person doing the repair work, and the person doing the repair work is, in my view, liable if there is any defect in the materials supplied, even if it was one which reasonable care could not have discovered."

The present case does not fall precisely under either of the classes the learned judge enumerated. If the plaintiff's first suggestion had been accepted and those sub-contractors had done the work, I think it would have been very much the same as saying: "Get the parts from the makers of the car" and the facts would have negatived any reliance by the plaintiff on the defendants' skill and judgment in respect of the lining to the brake-drums. The particular purpose of the work which the plaintiff contracted to have done was obvious. It was the very object of the arrangement, namely, to be provided with an efficient braking system for his Bentley car, which was a car specially designed for speed, and, therefore, required a braking system adequate for such speeds as were in contemplation. The size and type of the drums themselves indicated a powerful braking system. The question arises whether this purpose, made known, as it was, to the defendants, was made known to them so as to show that the plaintiff relied on their skill and judgment. I find that the effect of what was said and done when the parties entered into the contract was that the plaintiff did rely on the defendants as experienced repairers to repair the brakes in a suitable and efficient manner, and it was left to them to obtain suitable sub-contractors to do the lining of the drums and to arrange for a suitable type of drum lining to be fitted. The plaintiff's original request for a cast-iron sleeve—that is a sleeve without a weld—was not carried out. The defendants and not the plaintiff substituted for that a strip-metal sleeve with a weld and, although some mention of the Re-Lined Brake-Drums, Ltd.'s quotation was made known to the plaintiff, more particularly as to price, he was not informed that this sleeve involved a weld. Once the defendants departed from the plaintiff's suggestion of a cast-iron sleeve, the type of lining was a matter within their province as repairers. It was their duty, in the circumstances, to provide good workmanship, materials of good quality, and a braking system reasonably fit for its purpose, and they failed to do so by reason of the faulty off-side front brake-drum lining. In fact, though unwittingly, the defendants handed over to the plaintiff a highly dangerous vehicle. The faulty lining caused the accident and the damage to the plaintiff's car, and the plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to recover damages in this action.

Learned counsel for the defendants sought to apply to this case the reasoning of TUCKER, L.J., in Edwards v. Newland (3) ([1950] 1 All E.R. 1080), and to allege that this was a complex contract where the defendants would be liable for such work as they did themselves if it were faulty, but with regard to work which it was known, indeed intended, would be sub-contracted, they were only under a duty to take reasonable care to employ suitable sub-contractors and were not to be liable for their default and were entitled to assume without further detailed examination that their work would be satisfactory. Edwards v. Newland (3) was a case of the storage of furniture for reward, and the furniture was stored elsewhere than in the defendant's premises without the knowledge of the plaintiff, the bailor and owner of the furniture. As the defendant had never fulfilled his obligation to be a bailee for storage, he was held to have been in breach of his contract ab initio. I do not find it possible to apply similar considerations to the facts of this case which are so essentially different. I would add that I have considered also the other authorities referred to on behalf of the defendants, but I do not regard them as sufficiently relevant to call for further examination.

Judgment for plaintiff for £283 2s. 4d. damages, less an amount set off in respect of work done. Counterclaim dismissed.

Solicitors: W. A. Sando, Parrott & Co. (for the plaintiff); Joynson-Hicks & Co., agents for W. Davies & Son, Woking (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. R. (otherwise F.).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Mr. Commissioner Bush-James, Q.C.), April 3, 4, 9, 1952.]

Nullity—Incapacity of husband—"Consummation"—Erectio and intromissio without ejaculation.

The husband was able to effect an erection and a full penetration of the wife, but he was never able to produce the emission of semen into the wife's body. In a suit for nullity on the ground of the husband's incapacity to consummate the marriage, HELD: the marriage was consummated by the erectio and intromissio, and, therefore, no decree could be granted.

AS TO INABILITY TO CONSUMMATE MARRIAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 640-643, paras. 937-941, and 1951 Supplement; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 265-272, Nos. 2328-2407, and Supplements.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Baxter v. Baxter, [1947] 2 All E.R. 886; [1948] A.C. 274; [1948] L.J.R. 479; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Napier v. Napier, [1915] P. 184; 84 L.J.P. 177; 113 L.T. 764; 27 Digest 268, 2370.
- (3) Grimes (otherwise Edwards) v. Grimes, [1948] 2 All E.R. 147; [1948] P. 323; [1948] L.J.R. 1471; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) White (otherwise Berry) v. White, [1948] 2 All E.R. 151; [1948] P. 330; [1948] L.J.R. 1476; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Cackett (otherwise Trice) v. Cackett, [1950] 1 All E.R. 677; [1950] P. 253; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) W. v. W., (1950), 1 Western Weekly Rep. 981, British Columbia.
- (7) D—e v. A—g (falsely calling herself D—e), (1845), 1 Rob. Eccl. 279; 163 E.R. 1039; 27 Digest 267, 2350.
- (8) L. v. L. (otherwise D.), (1922), 38 T.L.R. 697; 27 Digest 267, 2357.
- (9) J. v. J., [1947] 2 All E.R. 43; [1947] P. 158; [1947] L.J.R. 1468; 177 L.T. 157; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (10) G. v. G., [1924] A.C. 349; 131 L.T. 70; 27 Digest 266, 2347.
- (11) A.B. v. C.B., (1906), 8 F. (Ct. of Sess.) 603; 43 Sc. L.R. 411; 13 S.L.T. 923; 27 Digest 269, 2371, i.

PETITION by the husband for nullity of marriage on the ground of his incapacity to consummate the same. By her answer the wife pleaded that the marriage was valid and subsisting, denied that the marriage had not been consummated, and said that the parties had sexual intercourse together about six months after the celebration of the said marriage, that during such intercourse full penetration was achieved by the husband, and that thereafter the husband and wife had sexual intercourse together on numerous occasions, on each occasion the husband achieving full penetration of the wife.

The marriage was celebrated on June 20, 1938, and there was no issue. At the time of the marriage the wife was twenty-seven years of age, and the husband twenty-five. The husband's character and characteristics, as summed up in a letter dated Feb. 15, 1941, from one of many doctors and psychologists whom the husband and the wife consulted over a period of years, were:

"Prior to the age of seventeen he appears to have had numerous illnesses, including bronchitis, pneumonia, an operation to his ear, removal of glands in the neck, and 'a complicated operation on the right groin' . . . His co-operation is certainly excellent and I only hope we will be able to help him with his difficulties. There seem to be two aspects of his problem—(i) The real and initial one—to obtain emission at the correct time and normal intercourse. (ii) Failing this, attempts to produce pregnancy in his wife."

According to the evidence the husband was brought up in "rather strait-laced circumstances". In his family any discussion of sex was taboo. He was subject to the usual involuntary nocturnal emission of semen of an adolescent, but apart from that he showed very little interest in matters of sex. After the marriage the parties occupied the same bedroom, and for some six months there was little or no attempt to consummate the marriage. At first the wife was afflicted by some small trivial disability, but at the end of some six months the husband, with the co-operation of the wife, was able to get an erection and to penetrate his wife fully. He maintained that state of things for a period of four or five minutes and did his best to secure the emission of semen, but he was unable to do that, and at no time was there any orgasm on the part of the wife. The husband withdrew from the wife with his penis still in a state of erection. Although he was unable to achieve consummation with the wife, he continued to have these nocturnal emissions of semen. From 1938 onwards for a period of eight years the parties consulted a variety of doctors and psychiatrists and a distinguished surgeon. The intention of those visits was the hope that a child might be conceived, and the husband underwent a series of treatments by all these doctors and psychiatrists and received advice from the surgeon. But in spite of their treatment and recommendations, the same conditions persisted, and the husband, although able to effect full penetration, was incapable of producing an emission. Early in 1947 the husband informed his wife that he had fallen in love with another woman. This affection seemed to have been very transitory and of no great depth, but in the following year, 1948, when the parties were residing at a farm in Berkshire there was in their employ a land girl, to whom the husband made overtures, and, after four or six abortive attempts, he achieved intercourse with her in the fullest sense of the word, that is to say, penetration and emission in the body of this girl. It was not until the present case came on for hearing that the wife, although she had heard scandal about her husband and this girl, ascertained that he had had intercourse in the fullest sense with her. After what occurred on the farm he wrote a letter to the wife asking her to acquiesce in a petition for nullity of marriage that they might be set free to marry again.

Simon, Q.C., and H. J. Phillimore for the husband.

Vaughan, Q.C., and J. Stirling for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 9. MR. COMMISSIONER BUSH-JAMES, Q.C., stated the facts and read the following judgment. Now I have to deal with the law. The petition is founded on paras. 3 and 4 where it is alleged:

"That the said purported marriage has never been consummated", [and]
 "that the petitioner was at the time of the said ceremony of marriage and has ever since been incapable of consummating the same."

In para. 2 of the answer it is pleaded that "full penetration of the respondent was achieved by the petitioner", and that fact is not disputed. The issue, therefore, turns on the meaning of the word "consummate", and it is necessary from the outset to make three distinctions. The first of these distinctions is set out in clear terms by LORD JOWITT, L.C., in Baxter v. Baxter (1). His lordship refers to the new ground for annulment introduced by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 7 (1) (a) (now s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1950), namely, "wilful refusal . . . to consummate", and points out that this ground, being a post-nuptial defect, differs completely from the old ecclesiastical ground of annulment, i.e., impotence, which must exist at the time of the marriage. To quote his own words ([1947] 2 All E.R. 889):

"It is necessary, however, to beware of applying too literally to suits for nullity under the section in question in this case principles and rules relating to suits for nullity on the ground of incapacity under the old jurisdiction. In such a suit it was, and still is, necessary to prove that at the time of the marriage the particular wife or husband was incapable of consummating the marriage with the other spouse, whereas the section has introduced as a ground of nullity a cause necessarily arising after the marriage which, as PICKFORD, L.J., said in Napier v. Napier (2) ([1915] P. 189), was 'contrary to the principles of the ecclesiastical law as administered in the ecclesiastical courts' . . . It is clear, therefore, that in relation to the meaning of the word 'consummate', the common area covered by suits for nullity on the grounds respectively of incapacity and of wilful refusal to consummate is very small."

The second preliminary distinction to which I refer relates to the practice of withdrawal before emission, the practice known as coitus interruptus. In Baxter v. Baxter (1) LORD JOWITT emphasised (ibid., 888) that he was expressing no view on that practice. But from the point of view of the present case, a case on impotence, the decisions on coitus interruptus are not of direct assistance, since, whatever remedies coitus interruptus may give rise to in practice (as to which learned judges have held different views (Grimes (otherwise Edwards) v. Grimes (3), White (otherwise Berry) v. White (4), Cackett (otherwise Trice) v. Cackett (5), W. v. W. (6)), it assumes the very point in issue in the present case, namely, whether emission is necessary to prove a man "potent" according to the old ecclesiastical laws.

The third distinction is one which I must have in mind the whole time, and it concerns the end of marriage. It used to be said, as in AYLIFFE'S PARERGON JURIS CANONICI, 2nd ed., p. 360, that "as the first cause and reason of matrimony ought to be the design of having an offspring; so the second ought to be the avoiding of fornication."

But in Baxter v. Baxter (1) LORD JOWITT said (ibid., 890):

"In any view of Christian marriage the essence of the matter . . . is that the children, if there be any, should be born into a family . . . but this is not the same thing as saying that a marriage is not consummated unless children are procreated or that procreation of children is the principal end of marriage."

He went on to emphasise the irrelevance of procreation as an end in marriage.

Bearing these three distinctions in mind, one must look at the medical evidence adduced before the court in the present case. It comes to this. The husband was able to obtain an erection and penetrate his wife, but during the conjunction of their bodies, and I use the expression advisedly, he was unable to ejaculate whether with or without spermatozoa and she was unable to enjoy an orgasm. That is the evidence, and there is no dispute of consequence concerning it. It was suggested that there was a possibility of what was termed a "leakage" by the husband when their bodies were joined as opposed to a proper, full ejaculation with or without seed. There was no evidence on that point, nor, indeed, could there be, as neither party would have been aware of such a thing, and I must disregard it, both for being hypothetical and for the reasons, taken by way of analogy, given by LORD JOWITT in Baxter v. Baxter (1) (ibid., 892) when deploring, in relation to the statutory remedy, the attempt to make "consummation" depend on an unwitting and unintentional hole in a contraceptive sheath. I have, therefore, to decide whether the husband or wife, physically joined together as they were from time to time, in fact consummated their marriage in the manner and to the degree which would have convinced the ecclesiastical lawyers that the marriage had been consummated. It is curious that there is no direct authority on the point that I have to decide, though this is probably due to the fact that such a question would not have arisen before the advances made by medical science in investigating and explaining the intimacies of the marriage bed, and in enabling parties to give evidence thereon in a comparatively scientific way.

What, then, was "consummation" in ecclesiastical law? The ecclesiastical lawyers, in fact, used the term "vera copula". "Copula", or copulation, means simply, in dictionary terms, "sexual union" (CONCISE OXFORD DICTIONARY), so that the meaning in law of vera copula must be sought elsewhere. I have referred already to LORD JOWITT's judgment in Baxter v. Baxter (1), and it is to be noted that in that case he cited with approval a statement in LORD STAIR'S INSTITUTIONS, 1681 ed., book I, tit. 4, para. 6, that the relevant factor is the creation of a consent, "... whereby ariseth that conjugal society, which may have the conjunction of bodies as well as of minds, as the general end of the institution of marriage, is the solace and satisfaction of man."

Then there is the "true distinction" stated by DR. LUSHINGTON in D—e v. A—g (falsely calling herself D—e) (7) (approved in Baxter v. Baxter (1)), a case in which the wife had no uterus at all when he said (1 Rob. Eccl. 299):

"If there be a reasonable probability that the lady can be made capable of a vera copula—of the natural sort of coitus, though without power of conception—I cannot pronounce this marriage void. If, on the contrary, she is not and cannot be made capable of more than an incipient, imperfect, and unnatural coitus, I would pronounce the marriage void."

Of course, in D—e v. A—g (7), the husband was capable of ejaculation, so that it may be said that in D—e v. A—g (7) there was coitus, i.e., penetration and ejaculation, and so it does not help in the present case. But examination of the passage cited shows that the learned judge was willing to treat coitus in the abstract as being identical with vera copula, i.e., as being equivalent to penetration without emission. (I emphasise that coitus in this sense has not the inference which appears in the term coitus interruptus where ejaculation is always implied.) So it may be said that a surgical operation before marriage which makes the wife incapable of bearing children does not make vera copula impossible: L. v. L. (otherwise D.) (8); though, again, I must point out that the husband in that case was, it seems, capable of ejaculation.

In White v. White (4), a coitus interruptus case, WILLMER, J., points out that vera copula means merely "conjunction of the bodies". I do not wish to refer further to the learned judge's conclusion because he is discussing a case where ejaculation was always possible, but he indicates ([1948] 2 All E.R. 155) that for some cases, and I think the present case is one of them, a "true conjunction" is achieved

"... as soon as full entry and penetration has been achieved. What follows goes merely to the likelihood or otherwise of conception."

I have already pointed out that Baxter v. Baxter (1) decided firmly that conception was not a principal end of marriage, indeed, it is well-known that a marriage might not be consummated in either the statutory or ecclesiastical sense, even though the woman has conceived from her husband with no artificial aid. It is not without interest to note, too, the case of J. v. J. (9), where the Court of Appeal held that a man who, by reason of an operation before marriage, rendered himself only capable of penetration and emission, but in such a fashion that the male sperm could not leave his body, was incapable of consummation in the ecclesiastical view. But that decision was virtually overruled in Baxter v. Baxter (1), and I do not think it affects the present case. Indeed the comment on it in Baxter v. Baxter (1) supports my view. A

Therefore, in my view, vera copula consists of erectio and intromissio. This is the view of the author in JACKSON ON THE FORMATION AND ANNULMENT OF MARRIAGE from which I have derived considerable assistance. At pp. 209 and 210 the learned author says:

“Contraceptive devices do not prevent intercourse—Vera copula consists of erectio and intromissio. Once this has been achieved, the fact that consummation, in the sense of potential conception, has been made impossible by the use by one or both of the parties of contraceptives, is irrelevant. Only intercourse in the sense of vera copula is necessary to ‘consummate’ a marriage. ‘A person is in law impotent who is incapax copulandi, apart from the question of whether he or she is incapax procreandi’.” B

This last remark is a quotation from LORD DUNEDIN in G. v. G. (10), and it is to be further observed that in that case LORD DUNEDIN refers ([1924] A.C. 354) to A.B. v. C.B. (11) where the marriage “never was actually consummated” and the husband had tried “all ordinary expedients to induce the wife to admit connection”. “Connection” is the operative word in that sentence. In my judgment, therefore, “connection”, or the “conjunction of bodies”, or “erectio and intromissio”, is for the present purpose—the purpose of deciding what is potency in ecclesiastical law—equivalent to consummation in the ecclesiastical view interpreted in the light of modern authorities. I wish to make it clear that the fact that the husband has been able to achieve consummation in the fullest sense with another woman, as that term is probably indicated in the statute of 1937 and now in the statute of 1950, has not affected my view in the slightest, as the medical evidence demonstrates that this case is a perfect example of impotence quoad hunc or hanc. I find, in consequence, that this marriage has been consummated, and the petition fails and must be dismissed. D

Petition dismissed. E

Solicitors: Corner & Co. (for the husband); W. H. Matthews & Co. (for the wife). F

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

COBB AND ANOTHER v. LANE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), March 31, April 1, 1952.]

Licence—Licence to occupy premises—Exclusive occupation.

Landlord and Tenant—Tenancy—Tenancy at will—Exclusive occupation of premises—Need to consider intention of parties.

The fact of the exclusive occupation of property for an indefinite period is no longer inconsistent with the occupier being a licensee and not a tenant at will. Whether or not a relationship of landlord and tenant has been created depends on the intention of the parties, and in ascertaining that intention the court must consider the circumstances in which the person claiming to be a tenant at will went into occupation and whether the conduct of the parties shows that the occupier was intended to have an interest in the land or merely a personal privilege without any such interest.

Dictum of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Booker v. Palmer ([1942] 2 All E.R. 676), applied.

Lynes v. Snaith ([1899] 1 Q.B. 486), no longer good law.

AS TO TENANCY AT WILL, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 117-121, paras. 130-134; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Replacement Vol. 31, pp. 32-42, Nos. 1890-2003.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Booker v. Palmer, [1942] 2 All E.R. 674; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Errington v. Errington, [1952] 1 All E.R. 149.
- (3) Lynes v. Snaith, [1899] 1 Q.B. 486; 68 L.J.Q.B. 275; 80 L.T. 122; 31 Digest, Replacement, 34, 1909.
- (4) Foster v. Robinson, [1950] 2 All E.R. 342; [1951] 1 K.B. 149; 31 Digest, Replacement, 697, 7888.
- (5) Marcroft Wagons, Ltd. v. Smith, [1951] 2 All E.R. 271; [1951] 2 K.B. 496.
- (6) Gorham (Contractors), Ltd. v. Field, (1952), unreported.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE STOVE in the Great Grimsby County Court, made on Jan. 4, 1952, in an action for possession.

The plaintiffs, who were the executors of Agatha Winifred Lane, deceased, the defendant's sister, claimed possession of a leasehold dwelling-house occupied by the defendant. In December, 1935, the defendant, wishing to buy a house, mentioned the fact to his mother in the presence of the deceased. His mother suggested the purchase of a house as a "nest-egg" for the defendant's daughter, then eight years of age. On May 1, 1936, the deceased entered into a contract for the purchase of a long lease of a house, and on May 7 at her request possession was given to the defendant. On June 24 the deceased completed the purchase. The defendant resided in the house, but he never paid anything for its use and occupation, and, although for the first year he paid the rates, they were subsequently paid by the deceased. On Nov. 28, 1950, the deceased died. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant was in occupation as a licensee. The defendant contended that the deceased had held the house on trust for his daughter and that it was so held by the plaintiffs, and, alternatively, that he (the defendant) was originally in occupation as a tenant at will, and that under the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 9 (1), that tenancy must be deemed to be determined at the end of a year from its commencement so that the plaintiffs' claim was barred by s. 4 (3) and s. 16 of the Act. The learned county court judge held that there was no evidence of a trust, and that the defendant was in occupation as a licensee, and he made an order for possession.

Mrs. E. K. Lane for the defendant.

Stranders and G. A. Draycott for the plaintiffs.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The plaintiffs claim possession of this house as executors of the estate of Agatha Winifred Lane, deceased. The defence is based on s. 4 (3) of the Limitation Act, 1939. The defendant's case before us is that when he entered into occupation, to use neutral words, he became a tenant at will of the deceased; that, under s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1939, that tenancy at will was deemed to be determined at the expiration of one year; and that after twelve further years' possession by him (the defendant) without any notice in writing, the estate of the landlord is defeated. Before the learned judge it was alleged that the house was held by the deceased in trust for the defendant's daughter. That allegation failed and there is no appeal against that part of the judgment.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The defendant went into occupation before the date for completion. Nothing turns on that except that it makes it more difficult to infer a tenancy at will, but it is not on that point that I rest my conclusion. The defendant said that when he first occupied the house he paid the rates, but that in 1937 he could not afford to do so any longer. He said:

"My sister agreed to pay the outgoings if I would remain and keep the house intact."

It seems to me there was a new agreement arrived at in consideration of his remaining and keeping the house intact.

Counsel for the defendant submitted that, notwithstanding certain modern authorities, where there is exclusive occupation for an indefinite period a tenancy at will must be implied unless there is something in the facts to prevent that conclusion. I do not know that I very much quarrel with that. The real question may be: What facts do prevent that conclusion? Certainly under the old cases (and I doubt if this has been affected by the modern authorities), if all one finds is that somebody has been in occupation for an indefinite period with no special evidence of how he got there or of any arrangement being made when he went into occupation, it may be that the court will find a tenancy at will. I am assuming that there is no document, or clear evidence as to terms. The modern cases establish that, if there is evidence of the circumstances in which the person claiming to be a tenant at will went into occupation, those circumstances must be considered in deciding what the intention of the parties was. In Booker v. Palmer (1) LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 676):

"Therefore, what we have to decide is whether there was any evidence upon which a tenancy between the respondent and Mrs. Goldsmith could be inferred. In my opinion, there is no evidence from which any such inference could be drawn. Whether or not parties intend to create as between themselves the relationship of landlord and tenant, under which an estate is created in the tenant and certain mutual obligations arise by implication of law, must in the last resort be a question of intention. Where the parties enter into a formal document the intention to enter into formal legal relationship is obvious; but when all that happens is a quite casual conversation on the telephone, it is very much more difficult to infer that the parties are really contemplating entering into any legal relationship at all and in particular, such a special relationship as that of landlord and tenant . . . There is one golden rule which is of very general application, namely, that the law does not impute intention to enter into legal relationships where the circumstances and the conduct of the parties negative any intention of the kind."

The learned county court judge, applying that and other cases to which I will refer to the facts of the present case, put his conclusion in this way:

"I think it is fair to infer that the defendant's occupation of the premises in the present case was a consequence of the family discussion which took place at Christmas, 1935. It was a method of providing financial assistance to the defendant and his wife and infant daughter by means of a convenient family arrangement. I do not think that there was any intention on the part of any of the parties concerned of creating any legal relationship or of assuming any legal obligations."

Unless the learned judge has misdirected himself that seems to me a finding with which we must not interfere. It depends on the facts. I can find no indication that he has done other than apply the principles as laid down by LORD GREENE, M.R., to the facts of this case.

In Errington v. Errington (2) DENNING, L.J., addressed himself to the question whether exclusive possession was, as is suggested in some cases, the test, so that, if you find exclusive possession, you must find a tenancy at will. That test was, undoubtedly, as I read it, applied and acted on by the Divisional Court in Lynes v. Snaith (3). In that case LAWRENCE, J., said ([1899] 1 Q.B. 488):

"As to the first question, I think it is clear that [the defendant] was a tenant at will and not a licensee; for the admissions state that she was in exclusive possession—a fact which is wholly inconsistent with her having been a mere licensee."

DENNING, L.J., came to the conclusion that that was no longer a final test and I think it may be that there is a certain ambiguity in the expression. In Errington v. Errington (2), Foster v. Robinson (4), and Marcroft Wagons, Ltd. v. Smith (5), it was clearly intended that the person who occupied the premises should have the possession which normally people have in their homes. Those cases show that exclusive possession is not a test negating the possibility of the occupier's being a licensee. If you use the expression "exclusive possession" as meaning the rights which a tenant has against his landlord, then, of course, it might well be that an admission of that would lead to the conclusion arrived at in Lynes v. Snaith (3). The report of that case does not give very full information regarding what was said when the defendant there originally went into possession, but, in so far as, both in the argument and in the judgment, the case proceeded on the basis that exclusive possession was wholly inconsistent with a licence, it seems to me that it is inconsistent with the three authorities in this court to which I have referred.

In his judgment in Lynes v. Snaith (3) CHANNELL, J., referred ([1899] 1 Q.B. 490) to an unreported case of a gamekeeper who was assigned a cottage to reside in by his employer and on the gamekeeper's death his widow was permitted to continue residing there rent free, without having any service to perform. It was held that that was a tenancy at will and that the Statute of Limitations would run. No doubt, in former days, except for the question of the statute, the distinction between a tenancy, whether at will or for a period, and a licence was not so important as it has become since the Rent Restrictions Acts came into operation. In many cases under those Acts it has a special importance. That fact has led to an examination of the distinction, and the solution that would seem to have been found is, as one would expect, that it must depend on the intention of the parties. As I read what LORD GREENE, M.R., said in Booker v. Palmer (1), which was cited by DENNING, L.J., in Errington v. Errington (2), and what is, at any rate, implicit, if not so stated, in the other cases, that is the guide which we have to apply. There is no inference of law which compels one to say that a man must be regarded as a tenant at will because one finds him, and, in the present case, his wife and daughter, living in a house as if it was their home. In the circumstances, as it seems to me, the learned county court judge applied the proper principles and came to the same conclusion as I would myself have come to. Therefore, I think this appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: This was a family arrangement whereby a house was bought in the name of the elder sister who allowed her brother to live in it.

He lived in it for more than thirteen years. The sister, meanwhile, paid the rates. When she died she left the property to other people, and her executors now claim possession. There is no answer to the claim unless the brother has obtained a title in himself—sometimes it is called a “squatter’s title”—because he has been in possession for more than twelve years. It is said that he was a tenant at will, that under the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 9 (1), his tenancy is deemed to be determined at the end of the first year, that he has been there for twelve years since, and so the property is his absolutely. It seems to me that the answer to that argument is that he was not a tenant at will at all, but only a licensee. Counsel for the defendant has brought all the authorities before us, old and new. Under the old cases there would have been some colour for saying that the brother was a tenant at will, but the old cases can no longer be relied on. Owing to the impact of the Rent Acts, the courts have had to define more precisely the difference between a tenant and a licensee. I endeavoured to collect the cases in Errington v. Errington (2) and since that case was decided we have added one more. Only last week we had a case where an employer had bought a house and allowed his servant to live there simply on the servant’s paying interest on the purchase price. It was held that the servant was not a service occupier nor a service tenant, but only a licensee: see Gorham (Contractors), Ltd. v. Field (6).

X The question in all these cases is one of intention: Did the circumstances and the conduct of the parties show that all that was intended was that the occupier should have a personal privilege with no interest in the land? It seems to me that the judge has so found. The defendant had only a personal privilege with no interest in the land, which he could assign or sub-let, and he could not part with the possession to another. He was only a licensee, and he cannot pray in aid the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1939. I would only add that I agree with all that my Lord has said about Lynes v. Snodith (3). That case can no longer be regarded as authoritative. The appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree. The considerations to which my brethren have drawn attention are so destructive of the defendant’s case that one need hardly trouble to look at the origin of the matter, but, if one does, one sees that the defendant’s case breaks down in limine because he claims that he was granted a tenancy at will by the deceased lady, Mrs. Lane, on May 7, 1936, when she gave instructions to the agents that the keys should be handed over to him. What was her position at that time? The contract for sale into which she entered was dated May 1, 1936, and completion was fixed for June 24. I gather that she paid a deposit, but she did not herself enter into possession. Therefore, her position on May 7 was that she would become entitled, on payment of the balance of the purchase money when it became due, to a decree of specific performance to compel the vendor to carry out his contract and complete the sale, and, further or alternatively, she would be entitled, if he refused to complete the sale, to sue him for damages. The one thing which she had not at that time was an estate in the land herself. She was not a tenant at will, and, unless she was, she could not create the tenancy on which the defendant relies. In the absence of a sufficient title or interest in her to carve out or to create a similar tenancy in the defendant, his claim, as I say, fails in limine. It was a novelty to me to hear counsel for the defendant describe her as a tenant at will, six days after the contract, when she had not entered into possession. I am well assured she was nothing of the sort and that her rights were merely as I have described them. I agree, therefore, that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Hancock & Scott, agents for Wilkin & Chapman, Grimsby (for the defendant); Bartlett & Gregory, agents for Beloe, Staveley & Baron, Hunstanton (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

JOHN LEWIS & CO., LTD. v. TIMS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid and Lord Cohen), March 3, 4, April 24, 1952.]

False Imprisonment—Arrest without warrant—Person arrested to be taken before justice or police officer as soon as reasonably possible—Right of detention for purpose of investigation.

The respondent and her daughter entered the appellants' shop where the daughter stole certain articles. They then left the shop and the daughter placed the stolen articles in a bag carried by the respondent. Two detectives employed by the appellants followed the two women outside the shop and saw them go into another shop where the daughter again stole an article and placed it in the respondent's bag. As they came out into the street one of the two detectives accosted them, said they had stolen the articles, and asked them to come with her. It was a regulation of the appellants that only a managing director or a general manager of the appellants was authorised to institute any prosecution. The respondent and her daughter were taken back to the appellants' shop and detained until the chief store detective and the managing director heard the account of the two detectives, after which the police were sent for and the respondent and her daughter were taken to the police station, charged, and released on bail. Next morning the daughter was tried and convicted, but the charge against the respondent was withdrawn by consent of the court as the appellants were advised that there was insufficient evidence to justify a prosecution. On a claim by the respondent for damages for false imprisonment, HELD: where a person in exercise of his common law right arrested a person without warrant, he should take the arrested person before a justice of the peace or a police officer, not necessarily forthwith, but as soon as was reasonably possible; in the circumstances, the taking of the respondent to the appellants' office to obtain authority to prosecute was not an unreasonable delay before handing her over to the police; and, therefore, the appellants were not liable for false imprisonment.

Wright v. Court (1825) (4 B. & C. 596), Hall v. Booth (1834) (3 Nev. & M.K.B. 316) and Morris v. Wise (1860) (2 F. & F. 51), considered.

Decision of COURT OF APPEAL ([1951] 1 All E.R. 814), reversed.

AS TO THE HANDING OVER OF A PERSON ARRESTED TO A JUSTICE OR CONSTABLE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, p. 96, para. 122; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 172-176, Nos. 1488-1538 and Digest Supps.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Christie v. Leachinsky, [1947] 1 All E.R. 567; [1947] A.C. 573; [1947] L.J.R. 757; 176 L.T. 443; 111 J.P. 224; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Wright v. Court, (1825), 4 B. & C. 596; 4 L.J.O.S.K.B. 17; 107 E.R. 1182; 14 Digest 173, 1508.
- (3) Hall v. Booth, (1834), 3 Nev. & M.K.B. 316; 14 Digest 175, 1531.
- (4) Morris v. Wise, (1860), 2 F. & F. 51; 175 E.R. 955; 14 Digest 175, 1533.
- (5) Cokayne v. Manyngam, (1470) 47 Selden Society 156.
- (6) Cave v. Mountain, (1840), 1 Man. & G. 257; 9 L.J.M.C. 90; 4 J.P. 572; 133 E.R. 330; 38 Digest 93, 693.

APPEAL by the appellants from an order of the Court of Appeal (LORD GODDARD, C.J., ASQUITH and BIRKETT, L.J.J.), dated Mar. 14, 1951, and reported, [1951] 1 All E.R. 814, affirming in part an order of DONOVAN, J., dated Nov. 24, 1950, and made in an action for malicious prosecution and false imprisonment in which the jury awarded the respondent, the plaintiff in the action, £176 5s. damages.

The Court of Appeal allowed the appellants' appeal on the issue of malicious prosecution, but decided against them on the issue of false imprisonment, holding that, in taking the respondent into their office and detaining her there while inquiries as to the circumstances of her arrest were being made, they had not fulfilled the requirements of the law that a person arrested without warrant should be taken forthwith before a justice of the peace or a police officer. From the latter decision the appellants appealed, contending that their duty was to act reasonably for the purpose of bringing the respondent to justice within a reasonable time.

Melford Stevenson, Q.C., Wilson, Q.C., Blomefield and A. W. Hamilton for the appellants.

The respondent did not appear.

The House took time for consideration.

April 24. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, the problem raised in this matter requires a determination by your Lordships' House of the principles on which, and the circumstances in which, the arrest of those suspected of felony can be justified in a case where no warrant has been issued, and it affects, I think, both the obligations of the police and those of private persons. The solution must, therefore, lead to a careful inquiry which is not rendered the less anxious by the fact that the appellants alone were represented in the argument before your Lordships or the fact that the sum at stake is a small one. When the liberty of the subject is at stake questions as to the damage sustained become of little importance.

The appeal is from an order of the Court of Appeal of Mar. 14, 1951, in so far as it affirms the judgment of DONOVAN, J. on an issue as to false imprisonment. The circumstances in which the claim arises are undisputed.

The respondent, Mrs. Tims, and her daughter visited the calendar department of the appellants' store in Oxford Street in the afternoon of Dec. 16, 1948, and while they were there Miss Tims was seen by a Miss Wheeler, one of the appellants' private detectives, to steal four calendars. As the respondent and Miss Tims were leaving the premises another private detective joined Miss Wheeler and the two together followed the mother and daughter along Oxford Street to Messrs. Littlewoods' store about three or four hundred yards distant. On the way Miss Tims transferred the four calendars to a paper bag which her mother was carrying. At Littlewoods Miss Tims stole a table cloth, and this too she placed in her mother's bag before leaving the store. When the respondent and Miss Tims had come out into the street again one of the two detectives accosted them, said they had stolen the calendars, and asked them to come with her.

The evidence established that the accusation of theft was made in the presence of both the accused and, though the mother is deaf, sufficiently loudly to give her some idea of the charge which was being made. This was the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal. The respondent, on the other hand, maintained that she had not been informed at first why she was being taken back to the appellants' premises, and the jury accepted her evidence. Her contention, accordingly, was that she had been arrested without being told what her alleged crime was and that, therefore, under the decision in Christie v. Leachinsky (1), the arrest was wrongful. It is plain, however, that she knew exactly what the charge was by the time the party had returned to the appellants' store. Indeed, the jury have found that one of the detectives then said: "Where is the stolen stuff?" The learned judge, however, as a result of the jury's answers to two questions put by him, held the appellants liable on the issue of false imprisonment on the ground that the respondent was not informed at the first opportunity that she was accused of stealing. On the other hand, it is clear from the daughter's evidence that the accusation of stealing was made in her presence and that of her mother. I quote from her cross-examination:

"Q.—Whatever was said, this is quite clear, is it not, that it was said in the presence and hearing of both you and your mother? A.—Yes. Q.—And whatever was said it was made quite clear that you were being accused of stealing? A.—As I have already said."

That testimony makes it apparent that the crime for which the arrest was made was plainly referred to. The respondent, it is true, denied all knowledge of the accusation until later, but she was deaf and there is nothing to indicate that the detectives had any reason to suspect that she could not hear what was said. They cannot, therefore, be at fault if the respondent did not hear. In my opinion, the decision in Christie v. Leachinsky (1) has no bearing on such a case. I make these observations lest it should be thought that full consideration had not been given in your Lordships' House to the argument which prevailed before DONOVAN, J., but, indeed, this aspect of the case is only a matter for consideration inasmuch as, if the respondent had taken part in the argument before your Lordships, she might have defended DONOVAN, J.'s decision in her favour on that ground.

After making the charge the two detectives took the respondent and her daughter back to the office of the chief store detective in the appellants' store and they were detained there against their will until the chief detective, a Miss Pearce, and a managing director had been summoned to the office and an account had been given to them of what the detectives had observed. Miss Tims, undoubtedly, protested that her mother was some ten to fifteen feet distant from her when the calendars were taken, and the jury have so found, but equally it is clear that the calendars were at a later time placed in the mother's bag, were present in it when the arrest was made, and were found in it at the chief detective's office.

Some difference appears to exist as to the length of time during which the two women were detained at the chief detective's office. Miss Tims said it was not less than an hour, and the jury, in answer to a question put to them in the form: "Was the plaintiff detained in John Lewis's against her will for an hour or so before the police were summoned?", replied "Yes". The exact length of the detention is, in my view, immaterial in the circumstances of this case, but the estimate of an hour or so is, in my view, not established by the evidence. No doubt, it seemed a long time to Miss Tims, but her own evidence is that she and her mother were arrested some time between 3.30 p.m. and 4 p.m., the police evidence called for the respondent is that they were summoned at 4.10 p.m. and after going to the office and hearing the story and accompanying the accused to the station, they reached the station at 4.30 p.m. The length of detention would only be material if it had been alleged that the two women were detained beyond such time as was reasonable to acquaint a director or manager of the circumstances and obtain his instructions whether to prosecute or not. No such suggestion was made, no evidence was called to deal with the point, and the respondent is, therefore, precluded from relying on it now. I only mention it because there may be cases in which it could be contended that, though a reasonable amount of detention would be justified, the actual detention was unduly long. In such a case it would be the duty of the judge to determine whether there was or was not evidence from which it could be deduced that the detention was unduly long, and, if he held that there was, to leave the question to the jury whether, in fact, it was longer than was justified. As I have said, however, no such inquiry is called for in the present case.

The evidence establishes that Miss Tims protested that her mother was in no way concerned with the theft, but the respondent herself seems to have offered no explanation of the presence of the stolen articles in her bag either to the detectives or at the office or before the court though it is in evidence that she did say in the presence of a police constable: "I did not have anything to do with it". Her failure to do so is, of course, not material as in any way establishing her participation in the crime, but it is a reason for accepting the view that the appellants' representatives genuinely thought her guilty.

The sequence of events after the return to the chief detective's office is that first she and afterwards a managing director were sent for and informed of what had occurred, and that the police were then sent for and arrived shortly after 4.10 p.m. though they were not immediately available on the first summons. The two accused were then taken to the police station, charged and released on bail. Next morning they were brought before the magistrate. At that hearing the appellants were represented by a solicitor, and the respondent was unrepresented. Inasmuch as Mrs. Tims was not beside her daughter at the moment when the calendars were taken, the solicitor appears to have thought that a jury might acquit the mother and, therefore, the charge against her should not be persisted in. He accordingly asked for a remand. It was suggested that, as he thought a jury might not convict and then asked for a remand instead of withdrawing the charge at once, his action supported an allegation of malice with which the appellants would be infected and would, therefore, be liable as having instituted or at any rate persisted in a malicious prosecution. I see no reason for supposing that the solicitor thought that the respondent was not guilty though he may have thought that a jury might not convict. But in any case John Lewis & Co. are the persons sued, not their solicitor, and as LORD GODDARD, C.J., has pointed out, they never instigated him to continue the prosecution after he thought it might not succeed. His caution is no evidence of malice and no allegation of malice is made against the two detectives or any of the other representatives of the appellants.

There remains only the question, therefore, whether the appellants were rightly mulcted in damages for false imprisonment because their servants did not take the respondent immediately before a magistrate, but brought her back to a part of the appellants' premises. It was maintained on her behalf that, though an arrest might originally be justified, yet it became wrongful if the person accused was not taken forthwith before a justice of the peace. The appellants admitted that they could not retain her for an unreasonable time before handing her over to a constable or a jailor, or bringing her before a justice, but contended that their obligation was only to act within a reasonable time and that an immediate and direct journey to the magistrate's court was not required. Of the three courses which the respondents asserted were open to them commitment to prison may today be neglected. The accused would not be received nor would the prison be available. The choice lies between an immediate bringing before a magistrate or, possibly, handing over to a police officer, and the like course taken within a reasonable time. As I have said, if the latter is the true obligation and if the appellants' representatives were justified in bringing back the respondent to the appellants' premises to get the advice of a manager and to obtain, if he thought fit, his authority to prosecute, there is no ground for saying that the time taken was unreasonable. But it is said on behalf of the respondent that it is not enough for the arrester to bring the person whom he has arrested before a justice or the police within a reasonable time: he must be brought before them "immediately" or "forthwith". If not, the arrest is wrongful.

The Court of Appeal has found the appellants liable on this short ground and on this short ground only. Their view has been expressed by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in a passage of his judgment, which I venture to quote ([1951] 1 All E.R. 817):

"The law is that if a person, be he a constable or a private person, arrests without warrant, although the arrest may be perfectly justified on the ground that a felony has been committed, or, in the case of a police officer, that there is reasonable and probable cause for believing that the person arrested has committed the offence, it is the duty of the person arresting forthwith to take the person arrested before a justice. That was the original law, but now I think—and this is the only respect in which I should be at all inclined to depart from the law which has been laid down for very many years—it is the duty to take the arrested person before a justice or to a police station, and before a police officer. I say that because, since the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, as amended and extended by other Acts, a superintendent or inspector of police, or other officer of equal or superior rank, has power to grant bail where a person is brought to the police station having been arrested without a warrant. Obviously, the reason why the common law required that a person should forthwith be taken before a justice was because he was being imprisoned, in the sense that his liberty was being curtailed, and it was, therefore, for a justice at once to consider whether or not the case should be investigated there and then, as might have been done in the old days when he sat in his own justice room, or whether he should grant bail. Now that a police officer has statutory powers to grant bail, he will do so, except in cases of gravity or where for good reason he may think it would be unsafe. In an ordinary case of a crime of this sort a police officer is as equally efficacious for the protection of the subject as a justice, and for that reason the arrested person should be taken forthwith before a police officer."

The learned Chief Justice supported this view by the citation of three cases and added (ibid., 818):

"... I am of the opinion that the taking of these two women to the defendants' store instead of direct to a police station or to a magistrate's court could not be justified, and, that, therefore, technically there was a false imprisonment of the plaintiff."

Before I analyse the cases and consider the history and principles which lie behind the problem presented to your Lordships, it is, I think, expedient to set out the grounds on which the appellants justify their action. It is undesirable, they say, that their detectives, who must of necessity be subordinate officials, should be entrusted with the final decision whether a prosecution should take place or not. Such a decision should only rest with a senior and responsible officer, and after he has heard any explanation which the accused person has to offer. Indeed, it is in the interest of the person arrested that, however conclusive the evidence should appear against him, he should have the opportunity of stating what he has to say and that, in a proper case, he should avoid the publicity of a public trial. The complaint here is not that the appellants acted unreasonably or harshly or detained the respondent for an unnecessarily long time, but only that it is the law and expedient in the interests of the public generally that the supposed criminal should be brought before the court as speedily as possible and afforded the opportunity of applying for, and being granted, bail. Bearing these considerations in mind I deal first with the three cases on which the Court of Appeal primarily relied.

The first is Wright v. Court (2), decided in 1825, where it was held that a constable arresting a man must take him before a justice to be examined as soon as he reasonably can and that detention for three days to enable a person whose goods had been stolen to collect and bring his witnesses was not justified. The judgment says (4 B. & C. 598):

"... it is the duty of a person arresting anyone on suspicion of felony to take him before a justice as soon as he reasonably can, and the law gives no authority even to a justice to detain a person suspected, but for a reasonable time till he may be examined."

A report of the same case in 4 L.J.O.S.K.B. 18 says the arrested man must be brought before the justice "within a reasonable time". For these propositions

COMYNS DIGEST, 5th ed., vol. 4, pp. 471-2 is referred to. The first passage (H.4.) says:

" . . . a man may be imprisoned by warrant of law, for that is a lawful process: as, by a constable ex officio, who upon complaint of a felony may commit the offender to an house, gaol or stocks, till he can be brought before a justice of peace . . . So, if a felony be committed, the offender may be apprehended by any private person."

A later passage (H.5) says:

" . . . the law gives no authority to a justice of peace to detain a person suspected, but for a reasonable time till he may be examined."

It will be observed that none of these passages uses the words "immediately" or "forthwith", though they leave open the question what is a reasonable time. Moreover, the three days' delay in that case was not for the purpose of bringing the man arrested before the justices, but of collecting evidence.

The second case was Hall v. Booth (3), decided in 1834. The headnote says:

"A person cannot apprehend another upon a suspicion of felony for the purpose of taking him to the place where the felony was committed in order to ascertain whether he was the thief."

But in those circumstances, the plaintiff was not arrested as a felon, but was taken to the place where the felony was committed to find out whether he had committed the crime or not. Accordingly, DENMAN, C.J., very naturally said (3 Nev. & M.K.B. 319):

"You may go to inquire, but you cannot take him."

In fact, however, the complaint appears to have been that no adequate grounds for suspicion had been set out in the plea, and leave to amend was given, a circumstance which seems only to be consistent with a complaint that the pleadings were not in order. No question as to the time allowable for taking an arrested man before a justice was raised. He was taken to a shop for the purpose of ascertaining if he was the thief and was not arrested as a felon.

The third case is Morris v. Wise (4), decided in 1860. The action was for false imprisonment and the plea not guilty by statute. The statute in question was (after amendment by the defendant of his plea) 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, and the charge was for stealing grass, a crime dealt with by s. 43 but not made a felony in case of the first offence. Apart from the Act, therefore, there would be no power of arrest. By s. 63, however, of the same Act a special power of arrest is given to any peace officer or to the owner of the property in question in respect of any person found committing any offence punishable either on indictment or on summary conviction "by virtue of this Act". This right, however, was subject in express words to the obligation that the offender should be immediately apprehended and forthwith taken before some neighbouring justice of the peace, and it will be observed that the power of arrest is only given to a limited type of individual and even then only if the offender is taken in the act. BYLES, J., who tried the case, pointed out that the plaintiff had not been taken straight to the magistrate, but had been taken to the defendant's house, and he left the question to the jury to say what damages should be given for the taking of the plaintiff by an indirect route. Under this direction the jury awarded 40s. The decision, therefore, has no direct bearing on the obligations imposed by the common law and clearly does not limit the general power of arrest. It would be an odd result of the Act if in all cases of felony no one but a constable or the owner of stolen property could arrest and only then if the person arrested was taken in flagrante delicto. The fact is that the Act does not lessen the common law power of arrest, but, on the one hand, widens it so as to include non-felonious offences, and, on the other, limits the persons who are entitled to arrest, and subjects them to the obligation to arrest immediately and bring the person concerned before a magistrate forthwith. In my view, therefore, the cases do not of themselves bear out the proposition that an arrested man must be taken before a justice of the peace immediately.

My Lords, similar additional powers of arrest are given by the Larceny Acts, 1861, s. 103, and 1916, s. 41, and by many other Acts and are subject to similar restrictions. I do not need to discuss them further, since the same considerations apply to them as to 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29. If, then, the three cases which have been cited are not authorities that an arrested person must be taken immediately before a magistrate, it is necessary to examine the practice which has obtained in this country both before and after the Acts and cases cited.

Where the right of arrest is given to a private person, it is obviously desirable that the arrested man should be entrusted to some official care as soon as possible, and statements to that effect are to be found in, I think, all the text-books old or new. But it does not appear that in earlier days it was essential that the accused man should be brought before a magistrate in order that he might be bailed. The practice is set out in HAWKINS' PLEAS OF THE CROWN, 8th ed. (1824), vol. 2, p. 174, s. 3:

"It seems to be agreed by all the old books, that wheresoever a constable, or private person, may justify the arresting another for a felony or treason, he may also justify the sending or bringing him to the common gaol; and that every private person has as much authority in cases of this kind as the sheriff or any other officer, and may justify such imprisonment by his own authority, but not by the command of another. But inasmuch as it is certain, that a person lawfully making such an arrest may justify bringing the party to the constable, in order to be carried by him before a justice of peace, inasmuch as the statutes of 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar, c. 13, and 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar, c. 10, which direct in what manner persons brought before a justice of peace for felony shall be examined by him in order to their being committed or bailed, seem clearly to suppose, that all such persons are to be brought before such justice for such purpose; and inasmuch as the statute of 31 Car. 2 [c. 2] commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act, seems to suppose, that all persons who are committed to prison are there detained by virtue of some warrant in writing, which seems to be intended of a commitment by some magistrate, and the constant tenor of the late books, practice, and opinions, are agreeable hereto: it is certainly most advisable at this day, for any private person who arrests another for felony, to cause him to be brought, as soon as conveniently he may, before some justice of peace, that he may be committed or bailed by him."

To the like effect is HALE'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN (1800), vol. 2, p. 81, in which it is said of private persons using their powers of arrest:

"Now what is to be done by a private person, that thus arrests a party upon suspicion of felony; if after such an arrest the party arresting discharges him without bringing him to a justice or constable, he shall be punished for the escape at the king's suit, but it makes not the imprisonment unlawful as to the party. 10 E. 4. 17. b. Or he may carry him to the gaol, and if the gaoler receives him, he that made the arrest is discharged, 10 E. 4. 18. a. but he must not carry him to a gaol of any other county than where he is taken, unless either there be no gaol in the county, or that he cannot for the danger of rebels bring him to that gaol. 11 E. 4. 4. Or he may deliver him to the constable of the vill, and that is a sufficient discharge. 10 E. 4. 17. b. But the proper way is to bring him to a justice of peace, who may commit, or discharge, or bail him, as the case requires."

HAWKINS in his turn quotes from DALTON'S COUNTY JUSTICE (1742) p. 408, where it is said:

"But in all these cases before, where a private man shall arrest another, he ought thereupon to commit the prisoner to the gaol or to carry and deliver him to some constable, or to some other officer, etc."

DALTON himself refers to FINCH'S COMMON LAWS OF ENGLAND. The first English edition (1759) says, at p. 368:

"Every one who suspects another of a felony . . . may arrest him; so that thereupon he commit him to gaol."

To the same effect is SHEPPARD'S ABRIDGEMENT (1675), vol. 2, p. 302, where, dealing with the right of a private person to arrest, he ends:

"he may of his own head, without any warrant from a justice of the peace, or officer, apprehend the felon, and carry him to a justice of the peace, or other officer, or to prison."

Finally, in BURNS' JUSTICE OF THE PEACE, the authority of which has been recognised in your Lordships' House in Christie v. Leachinsky (1), it is stated—I quote from the 30th ed. (1869), vol. 1, p. 305:

"When a private person has apprehended another for treason or felony, he should deliver him over to a constable, or carry him before a magistrate or to any gaol in the county. It is rarely the case that a private person carries the party to gaol. He cannot apprehend or discharge the party at his own pleasure . . . Neither can he, it seems, apprehend and deliver the party over to a constable only, but he must follow up the charge by attending before the magistrate, and then only he ceases to be an actor."

One may, perhaps, add the authority of Cokayne v. Manyngham (5), reported in vol. 47 of the Selden Society publications at p. 157, in which the court held that "if a man arrest another for felony and deliver him to the constable that then he is loyally discharged even if the constable has let the prisoner go at large and has not led him to the gaol."

My Lords, I quote these authorities not for the purpose of suggesting that the obligation to bring an arrested person before a magistrate within a reasonable time has been lessened or abolished or of putting forward a contention that the duty may be laxly discharged, but in order to establish that the obligation is not in terms to proceed before the magistrate forthwith or immediately as certain special Acts require. The object of bringing a man arrested before a magistrate is not, as I view it, to ensure that the accused man may be bailed at once. The right to give bail in the case of anyone other than a justice of the peace did not exist before the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and even then the provisions of s. 38 only gave the right to grant bail to police officers if it was not practicable to bring the alleged offender before a court of summary jurisdiction as soon as practicable after he is taken into custody. Nor has the enlargement of those powers by later Acts effected any alteration in the length of the time given to bring the arrested man before a magistrate. Indeed, under the earlier procedure the individual who arrested was given the choice of three alternatives—gaol, the constable, or the justice. Today the gaol would not receive the prisoner, and I think that BURNS' requirement is right—a handing over to a constable is not enough; the arrester is not free of his obligation until he has proceeded before a magistrate. Nevertheless, the mere fact that the handing over to a constable is one of the methods prescribed for ridding oneself of the prisoner indicates a less stringent obligation than to proceed before the justice forthwith.

The two methods of approach are, perhaps, best seen by comparing the statement contained in the article on CRIMINAL LAW in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (Hailsham ed.), vol. 9—a subject which was entrusted to the late AVORY, J. At p. 96, para. 122, it is said:

"A private person who arrests another under a common law power can only detain him for a reasonable time, and must then either set him free or hand him over to a constable or take him before a justice of the peace. If the suspected offender is not liberated and is not taken before a justice with reasonable expedition and by a direct road, the person who arrests is liable to an action of trespass."

For the latter statement Wright v. Court (2) is referred to, but that case merely speaks of "a reasonable time". Whether the time taken falls within that requirement is a matter of fact. No doubt, the route taken is one matter for consideration, but in the present case the learned judge who tried the case did not consider the time too long or the route adopted and the delay in proceeding to the appellants' office unreasonable. As against this statement of the law may be contrasted that contained in CLERK & LINDSELL ON THE LAW OF TORTS, 10th ed., p. 308, where it is said:

"The statutes authorising arrests without warrant generally provide that the arrested party shall be taken immediately or forthwith before a justice of the peace, but these provisions are only declaratory of the common law. So jealous is the law on this point that if the prisoner be conducted by a circuitous instead of the ordinary direct road he may recover for a false imprisonment."

For this statement Morris v. Wise (4) is quoted. That case, however, as is pointed out above, was not one of arrest under the common law, and I see no reason for assuming that statutes which enlarge the power of arrest so as to include misdemeanours, but limit the persons to whom the power of arrest is granted, are merely declaratory of the common law right or that the same principles apply to both classes.

What the common law requires is that, if a man be arrested on suspicion of felony, he should be taken before a tribunal which can deal with his case expeditiously. The question throughout should be: Has the arrester brought the arrested person to a place where his alleged offence can be dealt with as speedily as is reasonably possible? But all the circumstances in the case must be taken into consideration in deciding whether this requirement is complied with. A direct route and a rapid progress are, no doubt, matters for consideration, but they are not the only matters. Those who arrest must be persuaded of the guilt of the accused; they cannot bolster up their assurance or the strength of the case by seeking further evidence and detaining the man arrested meanwhile or taking him to some spot where they can or may find further evidence. But there are advantages in refusing to give private detectives a free hand and leaving the determination of whether to prosecute or not to a superior official. Whether there is evidence that the steps taken were unreasonable or the delay too great is a matter for the judge. Whether, if there be such evidence, the delay was in fact too great is for the jury: see Cave v. Mountain (1840) (1 Man. & G. 257). In the present case the complaint was, as I have said, not that the detention was too long, but that a direct route from the place of arrest to the magistrate's court had not been taken. In my opinion, that is not the vital question. Rather it is whether, in all the circumstances, the accused person has been brought before a justice of the peace within a reasonable time, it being always remembered that that time should be as short as is reasonably practicable. I would allow the appeal.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and I agree with it.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, the question of law which arises on this appeal may be stated as follows:—When one person arrests another without a warrant in exercise of the common law power of arrest, is it the duty of the person making the arrest to take the arrested person before a justice or to a police station "forthwith", or is it the duty of the person making the arrest to take the arrested person before a justice or to a police station "as soon as he reasonably can"? The latter phrase is quoted from the judgment of the court in Wright v. Court (2) (4 B. & C. 598).

The authorities on this subject have been fully discussed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I agree with his reasoning and with his conclusion, and I desire only to add a few words on the further question whether the two detectives took the respondent to the Marylebone Lane police station as soon as they reasonably could. In my opinion, they did. It was a regulation of the appellants that only a managing director or a general manager of the appellants was authorised to institute any prosecution against any person. This being so, it was, I think, reasonable for the detectives to take the respondent to the office at the appellants' premises for the purpose of getting authority for a prosecution. I cannot find any evidence that they went there for any other purpose. The case would have been a different one if they had gone there for the purpose of filling in gaps in the evidence: see Hall v. Booth (3) and Morris v. Wise (4). On reaching the office, the detectives explained what they had seen to the appellants' chief store detective and subsequently to Commander Newdegate, the managing director of the appellants' store in Oxford Street. As soon as Commander Newdegate had authorised the prosecution of the respondent and her daughter on a charge of theft, the police were sent for and they arrived a few minutes later from the Marylebone Lane police station. The substance of the facts was told to the police officers, and the respondent and her daughter were taken to the said police station.

My Lords, it does not appear that any point was taken either before DONOVAN, J., or in the Court of Appeal as to the length of time for which the respondent was detained at the office. The complaint was that she was taken there at all, instead of being taken direct to the police station. It is, I think, clear that DONOVAN, J., attached no importance to the length of the detention, for the first question which he put to the jury in regard to the alleged false imprisonment was:

"Was the plaintiff detained against her will in John Lewis's for an hour or so before the police were summoned?"

If the learned judge had attached any importance to the length of the detention, he would surely have divided this question into two parts—(i) Was the plaintiff detained against her will in John Lewis's? (ii) If so, for how long was she detained? Further, I think, it appears from the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., that he regarded the respondent's case as being based on the fact that she was taken to the office, and not on the length of time during which she was detained there.

If the detectives acted reasonably, having regard to the regulation to which I have already referred, the further question must be considered whether the regulation was a reasonable one to impose on detectives whose duty it might be to arrest a suspected person. For if the regulation was such as to result in an unlawful infringement of the liberty of the subject, such infringement could not be excused on the ground that the detectives were merely carrying out the regulation. In my opinion, the regulation was a reasonable one. On this point I agree with the submissions of counsel for the appellants, which they summarised as follows:

"(A) It is undesirable that the power or duty to institute proceedings on behalf of corporations or other persons should be delegated to subordinate employees thereof or should be exercised by any but senior and responsible officers or representatives thereof. Since, in the case of suspected shop-lifting, it is not practicable to arrest a suspected person until he has left the premises without paying for goods which he has taken, it will not be practicable for a senior and responsible officer or representative to decide whether a charge should be made unless subordinate employees such as store detectives are entitled to take an arrested person back to the premises before he is handed over to the police.

"(B) It is in the interests of an arrested person himself that he should not be charged without being given an opportunity of offering any explanation or making any representation to a responsible officer or representative of the prospective prosecutors. It is to his own advantage that this opportunity should be given in the privacy of an office with the minimum possible number of persons present. This safeguard is especially important when the arrested person is very young or old or appears to be mentally unstable. In such cases it is in the public interest that a lenient and responsible discretion should be exercised before any charge is made."

I would allow the appeal.

LORD REID: My Lords, I concur.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, my noble and learned friend LORD COHEN asks me to say that he has had an opportunity of reading my opinion and he agrees with it.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Underwood & Co. (for the appellants).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, Barrister-at-Law.]

DONALDSON v. McNIVEN.

[LIVERPOOL ASSIZES (Pearson, J.), February 21, 22, 25, 1952.]

Negligence—Air rifle—Liability of parent.

The defendant, who lived in a populous district of Liverpool, allowed his son, aged thirteen years, to have an air rifle on condition that it was never used outside the house. There was a large cellar to the defendant's house where the son was allowed to use the air rifle. Behind the house and providing access to it and other houses was an alley-way where children came to play. Without the defendant's knowledge, the son fired the air rifle in the alley-way and injured the plaintiff, a child aged five, who was standing at the entrance to the alley-way.

HELD: an air rifle was not a dangerous thing per se in the sense that a savage animal or poison or fire was a dangerous thing per se, but it was potentially dangerous in the sense that it might cause injury if negligently used, and a parent was negligent if he allowed a child aged thirteen to have an air rifle and did not take any precautions which were reasonably necessary to preclude the dangerous use of it, but in the circumstances the precautions taken by the defendant to restrict the use of the air rifle to a place of safety were suitable and would have been adequate but for the son's disobedience which could not reasonably have been foreseen or contemplated by the defendant, and, therefore, the defendant was not guilty of negligence.

AS TO DANGEROUS ARTICLES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, p. 629, para. 883; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 56-58, Nos. 353-364.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Bebee v. Sales, (1916), 32 T.L.R. 413; 36 Digest 57, 361.
- (2) Burfitt v. Kille (A. & E.), [1939] 2 All E.R. 372; [1939] 2 K.B. 743; 108 L.J.K.B. 669; 160 L.T. 481; Digest Supp.
- (3) Ricketts v. Erith Borough Council, [1943] 2 All E.R. 629; 113 L.J.K.B. 269; 169 L.T. 396; 108 J.P. 22; 2nd Digest Supp.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff, a young child suing by his father as next friend, was injured by a pellet from an air rifle fired by the defendant's son, who was thirteen years old at the time. The rifle was fired in an alley-way where children came to play. It was contended, inter alia, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendant did not exercise proper care in allowing the son to have the air rifle in a populous district. The defendant contended that he had discharged the duties of a reasonably prudent parent by ordering the son not to use the air rifle outside the house.

Nance for the plaintiff.

Youds for the defendant.

PEARSON, J.: The infant plaintiff, who was five years old at the time of the accident, sues by his father as next friend for damages in respect of personal injury causing total loss of sight in his right eye. The injury was caused by a pellet fired from an air rifle by another boy, Donald McNiven, who was thirteen years old at the time of the accident. The action is brought, not against the boy who fired the pellet, but against his father, William McNiven, for damages for negligence. Authority for bringing the action against the father in such cases is afforded by Bebee v. Sales (1). Other cases which I have considered include Burfit v. A. E. Kille (2), and Ricketts v. Erith Borough Council (3).

At the material time the defendant and his family occupied a house and shop, known as No. 285 Scotland Road, Liverpool. Behind the shop, on the ground floor, is a store room, from which there are steps leading down to a cellar. The cellar is forty-five feet long and fairly well lit. Above the ground floor there are the living-room and some bedrooms. Behind No. 285 Scotland Road there is a small back yard and then a wall, and behind the wall there is an alley-way which provides access to the backs of the properties in Scotland Road and also to the back of the property on the other side of the alley-way. The alley-way is about fifty-one feet long and is four feet, four inches, wide. At one end, near the back entrance of No. 285 Scotland Road, the alley-way is enclosed by a wall. The other end of the alley-way opens on to Silvester Street, where the infant plaintiff and his parents live. At the end of the alley-way there is a gate, but at the material times it was never locked. Children came to play in the alley-way or at its entrance and used to swing on the gate and climb.

Early in July, 1950, the defendant and his wife and children went for a holiday in London. The defendant knew that his son wished to buy an air rifle, and they both went to a shop in Oxford Street and inquired the price of air rifles, but they found that they were too expensive. On July 4 the son saw an air rifle priced at 25s. in a shop in the Strand, and then either the defendant bought it for his son at the son's request or the son bought it with his own money, but with the consent of the defendant. The defendant's wife, however, did not wish her son to have an air rifle, and, as soon as she heard of the purchase, she strongly objected to it. Eventually she gave way and let the boy keep the rifle, but only on condition that he promised on his word of honour never to use it outside the house in Liverpool. He gave that promise to his mother in the presence and hearing of the defendant. The defendant agreed with or was persuaded by his wife, and later he ordered his son not to use the rifle outside the house in Liverpool. According to the defendant's own evidence, he gave an order or warning to this effect in emphatic and minatory terms on two occasions, once in London and again on their return to Liverpool. I think this evidence may be exaggerated, but I find that such an order was given by the defendant to his son on at least one occasion before or at the time of the return to Liverpool.

After the return to Liverpool the air rifle was kept in the store room beside the top of the steps leading to the cellar, and until the day of the accident, July 14, 1950, it was used only in the cellar, and no complaint was made with regard to it. Originally the defendant's son did not have any proper ammunition, and he used only match sticks for firing in the cellar, but afterwards another boy procured some pellets for him and he fired the pellets in the cellar. The defendant's son was a boy of normal intelligence and disposition, and not specially obedient or disobedient. The defendant said that, so far as he knew, his son had never disobeyed a direct order. The defendant's wife admitted that "boys will be boys" and that the son had been smacked or thrashed for various things, and he had sometimes been disobedient. On the whole, I do not think that they had any reason to anticipate that, when the son had a place to use the air rifle inside the house, had been ordered by the defendant not to use it outside the house, and had given his word of honour to his mother that he would not do so, he would be so disobedient and dishonourable as to do so. It is a debatable question, but that is the conclusion to which I have come, having seen the boy and his parents in the witness box and having carefully considered the facts.

On July 14, 1950, the defendant's son called on a friend, Harold Hurley, and brought him back to see the air rifle. They came into the alley-way where Harold remained both because he was not invited to enter the house and also because he was afraid of a dog kept by the defendant in the back yard. The defendant's son went by the back door through the yard into the store room, and, in breach of his instructions from his parents and the promise which he had given to his mother, brought the air rifle into the alley-way and he and Harold proceeded to fire it. They were firing it from the inclosed end of the alley-way at a drain pipe which was about the middle of the alley-way, and, therefore, on the way to the open end of the alley-way opening on to Silvester Street. This was a foolish and negligent thing for them to do, involving risk of injury to persons passing in Silvester Street and especially to any child who might turn into the alley-way. Some small children entered the alley-way and were chased away by the two boys. The infant plaintiff himself had been in the alley-way earlier in the morning. At the time of the accident the defendant's wife was out and the defendant, who was in the upper part of the house, did not hear the boys firing the air rifle in the alley-way. The infant plaintiff came along Silvester Street and stopped at the entrance to the alley-way and looked into it just when the defendant's son was aiming a shot at the drain pipe and was pressing the trigger. A pellet was fired, and, apparently, it hit the drain pipe and ricocheted off it. At any rate, the pellet hit the infant plaintiff in the right eye. An operation was unsuccessful and the infant plaintiff's right eye is permanently blind. If there were liability, I should assess the damages at £1,750. The air rifle was, at my request, tested by a police sergeant to ascertain how far it would fire a pellet. He fired a pellet at a distance of about twenty-five yards at an iron gate and he found that the pellet struck the iron gate at a true trajectory at a height of about six feet and ricocheted back off the gate, and that there was still force in the pellet when it struck the ground. The air rifle was described as a Millbrow scout gun, and there was a figure of a boy scout on it. At the trial no reference was made to any rules or regulations, and no evidence was given of this type of air rifle being classified or considered as more dangerous than others.

I thought it right to consider the provisions of the Firearms Act, 1937, to see whether they would give any guidance as to the status of an air rifle in relation to the requirements of public safety. Section 2 (2) and s. 2 (7) show that the Act is concerned, inter alia, with the public safety and the fitness of persons to be entrusted with firearms. Although an ordinary air rifle might not naturally be regarded as a "lethal barrelled weapon", within the definition of "firearm" in s. 32 (1) of the Act, I think it appears from a comparison of the definition with the provisions of s. 16 (1) that, for the purposes of the Act, an ordinary air rifle is sufficiently "lethal" to be a "firearm" within the meaning of the Act. Section 19, read in conjunction with s. 16 (1), shows that a person under the age of seventeen is prohibited from purchasing or hiring any air rifle, but is not prohibited from accepting as a gift or borrowing, and having in his possession without a licence, an air rifle not being of a type declared by rules to be specially dangerous. The Act is concerned with criminal liability and is not concerned with civil liability for negligence. Nevertheless, I think its provisions ought to be taken into account in considering the legal requirements of air rifles and the standard of care in relation to them. The legislature in 1937, when dealing comprehensively with the subject of the acquisition and possession of firearms, did not consider it necessary to put ordinary firearms out of the reach of boys under seventeen.

An air rifle is not, in my opinion, a dangerous thing per se, in the sense that a savage animal or poison or fire is a dangerous thing per se. It is, however, potentially dangerous in the sense that it may cause injury if negligently used, and a parent is negligent if he allows his son aged thirteen to have an air rifle and does not take any precautions which are reasonably necessary in the circumstances to preclude the dangerous use of it. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant did not exercise proper care in letting his son have the air rifle in that particular locality, the defendant's house being in a populous working-class district and backed by the alley-way; that a mere warning was not sufficient discharge of his duty in view of the air rifle being a dangerous thing; that his duty was to ensure that the rifle was used only in the cellar; and that the defendant's son, who had been guilty of disobedience in the past, was left largely without supervision during the daylight hours. It was argued on behalf of the defendant that he had discharged the duties of a reasonably prudent parent; that it was not negligence for a parent to place an air rifle in the hands of a boy thirteen years old, for use only in a confined place such as a cellar; that the defendant was not responsible for his son's torts; and that, while he would be responsible for his own personal negligence in affording or allowing his son an opportunity of doing mischief, there was, on the evidence, no such negligence in this case.

This is not an easy case, but I have come to the conclusion that, on a fair balance of the requirements of public safety with the requirements of individual freedom, it should not be regarded as negligence on the part of a father to allow his son to have an air rifle in a populous district if suitable precautions are taken to restrict the use of it to a place of safety, and that in the circumstances the precautions taken in this case were suitable and would have been adequate, but for the act of extreme disobedience and unfaithfulness and folly on the part of the son which could not reasonably have been foreseen or contemplated by his parents and was the cause of the accident. I, therefore, decide the issue of liability in favour of the defendant and I give judgment for him.

Judgment for defendant.

Solicitors: J. Trevor Booth & Banfi, Liverpool (for the plaintiff); John A. Behn, Twyford & Reece, Liverpool (for the defendant).

[Reported by MISS M. D. CHORLTON, Barrister-at-Law.]

Re ROSE (deceased). ROSE AND OTHERS v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.J.J.),
April 3, 4, 1952.]

Estate Duty—Gift inter vivos—Date when made—Shares—Transfer before April 10, 1943—Transfer registered after that date.

By a transfer dated Mar. 30, 1943, the deceased, in consideration of his love and affection for his wife, transferred to her ten thousand shares of £1 each in an unlimited company to hold subject to the several conditions on which he held the same at the time of the execution thereof. By another transfer of the same date, the deceased, in consideration of the payment of 10s., transferred a similar number of the said shares to his wife and R. to hold subject to the same conditions. By a settlement of the same date, made between the deceased, of the first part, the wife, of the second part, and the wife and R. (as trustees), of the third part, trusts were declared of the second block of shares in favour of the wife and the son of the deceased. Under the articles of association of the company the directors were empowered, in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion and without assigning any reason, to decline to register any proposed transfer of shares. The deceased was governing director of the company and as such had full and uncontrolled authority to determine who should be admitted from time to time to be a shareholder of the company. The other directors were the deceased's wife and R. The two transfers (which were in the form prescribed by the articles of the company) and the settlement were executed by all parties between Mar. 30, 1943, and Apr. 5, 1943, and the share certificates of both blocks of shares were thereafter held by R. The transfers were not registered until June 30, 1943, and it was agreed that (having regard to the transitional provisions contained in the Finance Act, 1946, sched. XI, Part II) all the shares would be liable to estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), unless before Apr. 10, 1943, there had been bona fide dispositions of the shares purporting to operate as immediate gifts inter vivos.

HELD: the deceased had done all in his power to divest himself of the shares and to vest them in the transferees, and the transfers were effective as between the deceased and the transferees to divest the deceased of beneficial ownership and to constitute the transferees the beneficial owners of the shares; the circumstance that the transferees must, to perfect their legal title, apply for and obtain registration, did not prevent the transfers from so operating, and pending registration the deceased was the trustee for the transferees of the legal estate in the shares which still remained in him; and, therefore, the gift of the beneficial interest in the shares had been made and completed prior to Apr. 10, 1943, and no estate duty was exigible.

Milroy v. Lord (1862) (4 De G.F. & J. 264), distinguished.

Re Rose ([1948] 2 All E.R. 971), approved.

Decision of ROXBURGH, J. ([1951] 2 All E.R. 959), affirmed.

AS TO LIABILITY OF GIFTS INTER VIVOS TO ESTATE DUTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 237-240, paras. 227-229; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 21, pp. 10-14, Nos. 45-67.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Milroy v. Lord, (1862), 4 De G.F. & J. 264; 31 L.J.Ch. 798; 7 L.T. 178; 45 E.R. 1185; 40 Digest 533, 770.
- (2) Re Rose, [1948] 2 All E.R. 971; [1949] Ch. 78; [1949] L.J.R. 208; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Re Fry, [1946] 2 All E.R. 106; [1946] Ch. 312; 115 L.J.Ch. 225; 175 L.T. 392; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEALS by the Crown from orders of ROXBURGH, J., dated Nov. 2, 1951, reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 959.

The taxpayers issued two originating summonses to determine the liability to estate duty of two blocks of shares in a private unlimited company gratuitously or for nominal consideration assigned by the deceased to or for the benefit of his wife and child before Apr. 10, 1943, the relevant date, having regard to the Finance Act, 1946, sched. XI, prior to which the gifts must have been made if duty were not to be levied thereon under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c). The transfers were not registered until after Apr. 10, 1943, and the Inland Revenue Commissioners claimed estate duty on the footing that the gift was not complete until the transfers were registered. ROXBURGH, J., held that the gifts were complete prior to Apr. 10, 1943, and that, therefore, no estate duty was chargeable.

Pennycuik, Q.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

Grant, Q.C., and F. N. Bucher for the taxpayers.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: On Mar. 30, 1943, one Eric Hamilton Rose (since deceased) executed two transfers of shares in a company known as the Leweston Estates Co. That company, as its name implies, was an unlimited corporation. The first transfer was expressed to be in favour of his wife, Rosamond Mary Rose, and to be in consideration of his love and affection for her. The second transfer was in favour of Mrs. Rose and another individual, and in that case the intention was that the transferees should thereupon hold the shares on certain trusts which it is not material to consider. These two transfers were presented for stamping on Apr. 12, 1943. In due course, the duty was adjudicated by the commissioners and the requisite ad valorem stamp impressed on the transfers. The transfers, with the relative certificates, were then presented to the Leweston Estates Co. for registration and were, in fact, registered on June 30, 1943. Unfortunately, the transferor, Mr. Rose, died some few years afterwards, and the question which has arisen in the two appeals is whether there elapsed, prior to Mr. Rose's death, a sufficient length of time, in accordance with the provisions of a number of finance statutes, so that these shares need not be taken into account for the purpose of assessing death duty on his death and aggregated with the rest of his estate. I do not find it necessary to expand the matter of time at all because it is not in dispute that the vital date, for the purpose of determining whether duty was or was not payable on the transferor's death, was Apr. 10, 1943. In other words, unless the transfers were effected within the meaning of certain provisions of the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts, 1881 and 1889 (to which I shall allude in a moment), before Apr. 10, 1943, there is no doubt that the Crown's claim for duty is well founded.

Before I turn to the sections, I should state one other fact about the Leweston Estates Co. It was a private company, and, therefore, its regulations comprehended articles of a very familiar character restrictive of the right of members to transfer their shares. In brief, the directors of the company had an absolute right to refuse registration. There was also an article in common form, art. 9, which provided:

"The company shall be entitled to treat the person whose name appears upon the register in respect of any share as the absolute owner thereof, and shall not be under any obligation to recognise any trust or equity or equitable claim to or interest in such share, whether or not it shall have express or other notice thereof."

The first provision of the statutes to which I wish to allude is the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (2), which is in these terms:

"The personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions, viz.:—(a) Any property taken as a donatio mortis causa made by any person dying on or after the first day of June, 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition, made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made three months before the death of the deceased."

To that sub-section an amendment was made by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11 (1), for it was there provided that

" . . . The description of property marked (a) [in s. 38 (2)] shall be read as if the word ' twelve ' were substituted for the word ' three ' therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained, to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise."

Those provisions, as is well known, were picked up and re-enacted in the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c). It was the claim of the Crown in both the present cases that the property, viz., the shares which were the subject of the two transfers I have mentioned, was not comprehended within the language of the two sub-sections I have read so as to be freed from liability thereunder, and, anticipating what I shall say later on, it is plain that the Crown's argument may be put on alternative grounds: (i) that the shares were not taken under a voluntary disposition made by a person purporting to operate as an immediate gift, or, alternatively, if they were, (ii) that bona fide possession and enjoyment was not assumed on the date of the transfers by the donee immediately on the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor. It is said by the Crown that until the transfers were registered in the books of the Leweston Estates Co. on June 30, 1943, either there was no effective transfer of the shares to the donee, or, alternatively, there was not until that date an entire exclusion of the donor from all benefit in respect of the shares. By way of illustration, the matter has been put thus for the purposes of the argument. The result of these transfers was such that if, between their date, Mar. 30, and the date of registration, June 30, the company had declared and paid a dividend in respect of its shares, that dividend must have been paid to the donor, Mr. Rose, and could have been retained by him for his own benefit, and the donees could have had against him no claim whatever to have the amount of the dividend handed over to her or to them respectively.

ROXBURGH, J., decided the question which arose in both cases adversely to the Crown. From those decisions the Crown has appealed. It will be sufficient and convenient for me now to confine myself to one of the transactions, the subject of one of the appeals, and I take that of the first transfer which I mentioned, from Mr. Rose to his wife. It is not in question that a decision on that matter will necessarily involve a similar decision in the case of the other. I will first read the transfer. It was in this form:

" I Eric Hamilton Rose of Leweston Manor Sherborne in the county of Dorset, Esquire, in consideration of the love and affection I have for my wife Rosamond Mary Rose of Leweston Manor Sherborne aforesaid (hereinafter called ' the said transferee ') do hereby transfer to the said transferee 10,000 (ten thousand) shares of £1 each Nos. 3 to 10,002 inclusive in the undertaking called the Leweston Estates Company to hold unto the said transferee subject to the several conditions on which I held the same at the time of the execution hereof; and I, the said transferee, do hereby agree to accept and take the said shares subject to the conditions aforesaid."

That document was executed under seal by both transferor and transferee, and there are certain observations which may be made on it. The first is that it was in form in exact correspondence with the requirements of the company's regulations, for in art. 29, dealing with the transfer of shares, it is provided that

"Shares in the company shall be transferred in the following form or as near thereto as circumstances will permit . . ."

The form which follows is that which Mr. Rose adopted. On the execution of the transfer the deed was beyond question delivered to the transferee, and there was also delivered to her the certificate relative to those shares. It follows, therefore, that so far as lay in his power the transferor, Mr. Rose, did all that he could—he followed carefully and precisely the obligations imposed on a proposing transferor by the article—to divest himself then and there in favour of his wife of all his interest, legal and equitable, in the shares.

The next thing to notice (and it is, I think, not without significance) is this. The company was unlimited, and this form of transfer differed, therefore, in one respect from the forms of transfer commonly found in the case of limited companies, in that it contained what was, in effect (because it was under seal) a covenant by Mrs. Rose to accept and take the shares subject to the conditions, i.e., the conditions imposed on shareholders by the regulations of the company, and it was executed not only by the transferor but also by the transferee. There is a third matter to which I think some relevance also attaches in considering the validity of the Crown's claim. I have said that on Apr. 12, 1943, the transfer was presented for adjudication to the stamping authority, and it bears an ad valorem stamp. The impressing of that stamp is justified by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 74, on the ground that subject as thereinafter provided.

"Any conveyance or transfer operating as a voluntary disposition inter vivos shall be chargeable with the like stamp duty as if it were a conveyance or transfer on sale . . ."

Approaching the matter, then, as one of common sense, or from which the application of common sense is not excluded, and having regard to the terms of the transfer, I should have thought it was exceedingly difficult to contend successfully that on the date of the transfer, Mar. 30, 1943, Mr. Rose did not, within the terms of s. 38 (2) (a) of the Act of 1881, make, and Mrs. Rose did not take under, a voluntary disposition purporting to operate as an immediate gift, but that, of course, is not conclusive, for there still remains on any view the question whether, during the period up to June 30, 1943, the transferor did not, by virtue of the peculiar characteristics attaching to shares in companies, and particularly in this company, retain an interest which did not cease until June 30, a date too late for the purposes of the taxpayers.

The burden, I think, of the case presented by the Crown may be briefly put as it was formulated in reply by counsel. This document, says he, on the face of it, was intended to operate and operated, if it operated at all, as a transfer. If for any reason it was at its date incapable of so operating it is not legitimate, either by reference to the expressed intention in the document or on principles of law well-established, to extract from it a wholly different transaction, i.e., so as to make it take effect, not as a transfer, but as a declaration of trust. I agree that on the face of the document it was obviously intended (if you take the words used) to operate, and operate immediately, as a transfer of rights. To some extent at least, it is said, it could not possibly so operate. To revert to the illustration which has throughout been taken, if the company had declared a dividend during this interregnum then it is not open to question that the company must have paid that dividend to the donor. So that vis-à-vis the company this document did not and could not operate to transfer to the donee the right against the company to claim and receive that dividend. Shares, it is said by counsel for the Crown, are property of a peculiar character consisting, as it is sometimes put, of a bundle of rights, i.e., rights against or in the company. It has followed from counsel's argument that, if such a dividend had been paid, Mr. Rose could, consistently with the document to which he has set his hand and seal, have retained that dividend, and if he had handed it over to his wife it would have been an independent gift. I think myself that such a conclusion is startling. Indeed, I venture to doubt whether to anybody but a lawyer such a conclusion would even be comprehensible, at least without a considerable amount of explanation. That again is not conclusive, but I confess that I approach a matter of this kind with a preconceived notion that a conclusion that offends common sense as much as this would prima facie ought not to be the right conclusion. JENKINS, L.J., carried the matter a stage further by illustration. He said: Suppose, on the Crown's view, the donor, retaining, pending registration, full rights over these shares (for counsel for the Crown argued that this document, not only did not transfer the legal estate, but that it transferred no interest or estate whatever), repented of his generosity and had then told the company not to permit his wife to get the transfer registered. And suppose that the wife went to the company and the directors of the company had nevertheless expressed themselves willing to register the transfer. Let it be then further supposed that the donor proceeded to take action to restrain the company by injunction from registering the transfer. If the donor, in truth, retained at that time a proprietary interest, it may seem to flow from the Crown's argument that the court would be bound to protect it by granting an injunction. That, indeed, was perhaps too startling for counsel, for he said that he thought the court would not grant an injunction and that, the document having at least operated as a gift of a piece of paper, viz., the share certificate, the donor could not be heard then to claim the court's assistance so as to restrain the company from doing that which possession, as on a gift, of the certificate and of this transfer, enabled the donee to require the company to do. I do not pursue these examples, but it seems to follow from testing this matter by such extreme cases, that the assertion that nothing whatever passed under this deed except the right to possess, as physical things, two pieces of paper is not right.

Milroy v. Lord (1) is, in truth, the foundation of the Crown's argument since it is on that case that depends the proposition that I have already tried to state, that, if this document was intended to operate as a transfer, effect cannot be given to what may be thought to have been the intention behind it by treating it as operating as a declaration of trust. It is necessary to examine the case with care because, being a decision of this court, it is, of course, binding on us. It was a case in which a Mr. Medley was the proprietor of a number of shares in a company known as the Bank of Louisiana. It was provided by the regulations of that bank that shares could be transferred in a particular way: they could be transferred in the books of the bank by following particular formalities which the regulations specified. Mr. Medley, out of the love and affection which he expressed to have for his niece, proceeded to execute a deed-poll, and by that deed-poll he said that he conveyed, transferred, set over and delivered, and by those presents conveyed, transferred, set over and delivered to Samuel Lord fifty shares, which were specified, such shares thereupon to be held by Lord as trustee on the trusts set out in the deed-poll. The deed-poll was executed under the hand and seal of Medley and of Lord. Now that deed-poll was not a form of transfer which was apt to procure a transfer of shares in the books of the bank according to the bank's regulations. That difficulty, in actual fact, was not necessarily of any significance, because Lord, at the same time, had a power of attorney from Medley whereby Medley gave power to Lord to do what was necessary by following the regulations of the company—among other things, to transfer to himself these shares. Lord did not avail himself of the power of attorney and nothing was done until Medley died, and then the question arose, to whom did these shares properly belong? The plaintiff, Mrs. Milroy, was the niece in whose favour the deed-poll had been made, and she claimed to be entitled, as beneficiary under the deed, to the benefit of the shares and to be beneficially entitled to them to the exclusion of Medley's estate. The Court of Appeal rejected that view, but I think it is quite plain that the basis on which they so decided was that this purported gift was incomplete or imperfect in the sense that the donor had not done all that lay in his power to do in accordance with the terms on which the shares were held by him to make his gift effective and to divest himself of his beneficial and other interests in the shares. It is pointed out, for example, by KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., that (4 De G.F. & J. 272):

"He might, however, have affected the legal title. It was in his power to make a transfer of the shares so as to confer the legal proprietorship on another person or other persons. But, as I have said, no such thing was done."

TURNER, L.J., to the same effect, emphasises the point when he says (ibid., 276) that the shares were never vested in Lord:

"... and the only ground on which he can be held to have become a trustee of them is, that he held a power of attorney under which he might have transferred them into his own name; but he held that power of attorney as the agent of the settlor . . ."

Then he observes that, the settlor having died, the power ceased with him.

It is, however, on certain other passages in the judgment of TURNER, L.J., that counsel for the Crown has mostly founded himself. I refer to what is said at p. 274. I think I should read a substantial passage:

"I take the law of this court to be well settled, that, in order to render a voluntary settlement valid and effectual, the settlor must have done everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, was necessary to be done in order to transfer the property and render the settlement binding upon him. He may of course do this by actually transferring the property to the persons for whom he intends to provide, and the provision will then be effectual, and it will be equally effectual if he transfers the property to a trustee for the purposes of the settlement, or declares that he himself holds it in trust for those purposes; and if the property be personal, the trust may, as I apprehend, be declared either in writing or by parol; but, in order to render the settlement binding, one or other of these modes must, as I understand the law of this court, be resorted to, for there is no equity in this court to perfect an imperfect gift. The cases I think go further to this extent, that if the settlement is intended to be effectuated by one of the modes to which I have referred, the court will not give effect to it by applying another of those modes. If it is intended to take effect by transfer, the court will not hold the intended transfer to operate as a declaration of trust, for then every imperfect instrument would be made effectual by being converted into a perfect trust."

Those last few sentences form the gist of the Crown's argument, and on it is founded the broad, general proposition that if a document is expressed as, and on the face of it intended to operate as, a transfer, it cannot in any respect take effect by way of trust—so far I understand the argument to go. In my judgment, that statement is too broad and involves too great a simplification of the problem, and, in my view, it is not warranted by authority. I agree that if a man purporting to transfer property executes documents which are not apt to effect that purpose, the court cannot then extract from those documents some quite different transaction and say that they were intended merely to operate as a declaration of trust which ex facie they are not, but if a document is apt and proper to transfer the property—is, in truth, the appropriate way in which the property must be transferred—it does not seem to me to follow from the earlier statement that, as a result, either during some limited period or otherwise, there may not arise, for the purpose of giving effect to the transfer, some trust. The simplest case will, perhaps, provide an illustration. If a man executes a document transferring all his equitable interest, say, in shares, that document, operating, and intended to operate, as a transfer, will give rise to and take effect as a trust, for the assignor will then be a trustee of the legal estate in the shares for the person in whose favour he has made an assignment of his beneficial interest. For my part, I do not think that Milroy v. Lord (1) is an authority which compels this court to hold that in this case, where, in the terms of the judgment of TURNER, L.J., the settlor did everything which, according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement, was necessary to be done by him in order to transfer the property, the result necessarily negatives the conclusion that, pending registration, the settlor was a trustee of the legal interest for the transferee.

The view of the limitations of Milroy v. Lord (1) which I have tried to express was much better expressed by JENKINS, J., in the recent case which also bears the name of Re Rose (2) (though that is a coincidence). It is true that the main point, the essential question to be determined, was whether there had been a transfer eo nomine of certain shares within the meaning of a will. The testator in that case, Rose, by his will had given a number of shares to one Hook, but the gift was subject to this qualification, "if such . . . shares have not been transferred to him previously to my death". The question was: Had the shares been transferred to him in the circumstances? He had executed (as had Mr. Rose in the present case) a transfer in appropriate form, and handed the transfer and the certificate to Hook, but, at the time of his death, the transfer had not been registered. It was said, therefore, that there had been no transfer, and (following the argument of counsel for the Crown) there had been no passing to Hook of any interest, legal or beneficial, whatever, by the time the testator died. If that view were right, then, of course, Hook would be entitled to the shares under the will. But JENKINS, J., went a little more closely into the matter because it was obvious that on one view of it, if it were held that there was a "transfer" within the terms of the will, though the transfer was inoperative in the eye of the law and not capable of being completed after the death, then Mr. Hook suffered the misfortune of getting the shares neither by gift inter vivos nor by testamentary benefaction. Therefore, JENKINS, J., considered Milroy v. Lord (1) and in regard to it he used this language ([1948] 2 All E.R. 978):

"I was referred to Milroy v. Lord (1), and also to Re Fry (3). Those cases, as I understand them, turn on the fact that the deceased donor had not done all in his power, according to the nature of the property given, to vest the legal interest in the property in the donee. In such circumstances it is well settled that there is no equity to complete the imperfect gift. If any act remains to be done by the donor to complete the gift at the date of the donor's death, the court will not compel his personal representatives to do that act and the gift remains incomplete and fails. In Milroy v. Lord (1) the imperfection was due to the fact that the wrong form of transfer was used for the purpose of transferring certain bank shares. The document was not the appropriate document to pass any interest in the property at all."

Then he refers to Re Fry (3), which is another illustration. JENKINS, J., continued (ibid.):

"In this case, as I understand it, the testator had done everything in his power to divest himself of the shares in question in favour of Mr. Hook. He had executed a transfer. It is not suggested that the transfer was not in accordance with the company's regulations. He had handed that transfer together with the certificates to Mr. Hook. There was nothing else the testator could do."

I venture respectfully to adopt the whole of the passage I have read which, in my judgment, is a correct statement of the law. If that be so, then it seems to me that it cannot be asserted on the authority of Milroy v. Lord (1), and I venture to think it also cannot be asserted as a matter of logic and good sense or principle, that because, by the regulations of the company, there had to be a gap before Mrs. Rose could, as between herself and the company, claim the rights which the shares gave her vis-à-vis the company, Mr. Rose was not in the meantime a trustee for her of all his rights and benefits under the shares. That he intended to pass all those rights, as I have said, seems to me too plain for argument. I think the matter might be put, perhaps, in a somewhat different fashion though it reaches the same end. Whatever might be the position during the period between the execution of this document and the registration of the shares, the transfers were on June 30, 1943, registered. After registration, the title of Mrs. Rose was beyond doubt complete in every respect, and if Mr. Rose had received a dividend between execution and registration and Mrs. Rose had claimed to have that dividend handed to her, what would Mr. Rose's answer have been? It could no longer be that the purported gift was imperfect; it had been made perfect. I am not suggesting that the perfection was retroactive, but what could he say? How could he, in the face of his own statement under his seal, deny the proposition that he had, on Mar. 30, 1943, transferred the shares to his wife? By the phrase "transfer the shares" surely must be meant transfer to her "the shares and all my rights, title and interest thereunder". Nothing else could sensibly have been meant. Nor can he, I think, make much of the fact that this was a voluntary settlement on his part. Being a case of an unlimited company, as I have said, Mrs. Rose had herself to undertake by covenant to accept the shares subject to their burdens—in other words, to relieve her husband of his liability as a corporator. I find it unnecessary to pursue the question of consideration, but it is, I think, another feature which would make exceedingly difficult and, I think, sensibly impossible, the assertion on Mr. Rose's part of any right to retain the dividend I have mentioned. Nor is the Crown's argument made any easier by the circumstance that another emanation of the Crown has adjudicated that stamp duty ad valorem under s. 74 of the Act of 1910 was payable on this transfer as a disposition of the subject-matter transferred.

For the reasons I have stated, I do not think that Milroy v. Lord (1) covers the case and I agree with ROXBURGH, J., in his conclusion to that effect. I also think that on principle the statement which counsel for the Crown has made the foundation of his argument, if it covers this case, is too widely stated. If, as I have said, the phrase "transfer the shares" is taken to be and to mean a transfer of all rights and interests in them, then I can see nothing contrary to the law in a man saying that so long as, pending registration, the legal estate remains in the donor, he was, by the necessary effect of his own deed, a trustee of that legal estate. Nor do I think that that is an unjustifiable addition to or gloss on the words used in the transfer. I find it, indeed, for my part, a less difficult matter in the way of interpretation than to say that this was, on its terms, merely a conditional gift, merely a transfer as a gift to Mrs. Rose of a particular right, viz., the right to get herself registered and thenceforward, but not before, to enjoy the benefits which the donor previously had in these shares. That, I think, is nothing like what the deed sets out to do. I have said that I reject the proposition that the distinction between a case such as this and a case such as Milroy v. Lord (1) is, as counsel for the Crown urged, indefensible. I think it is sensible and real, and for these reasons I would dismiss the appeals.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The combined effect of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, s. 38 (2) (a), the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, s. 11 (1), and the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), together with subsequent legislation affecting the period of time before the death of a deceased within which transactions inter vivos are to be taxable is that any disposition made by a deceased person purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos not made at least the prescribed minimum period before the death attracts duty. Furthermore, any gift, whenever made, of which bona fide possession and enjoyment is not assumed forthwith on the gift and thenceforth retained for at least the prescribed minimum period prior to the death to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him, by contract or otherwise, likewise attracts duty. As the law stood at the date of the death, on Feb. 16, 1947, of the deceased with whom this case is concerned, the relevant minimum period before the death had in general been increased to five years, but, by virtue of certain transitional provisions applicable to his case, a transaction of either of the kinds I have mentioned would escape duty, provided that any such gift or disposition made by him was made before Apr. 10, 1943, and provided, further, that as regards any gift or disposition made by him before that date bona fide possession and enjoyment had been assumed by the donee to the entire exclusion of the deceased and any benefit to him, by contract or otherwise, from before the same date, Apr. 10, 1943.

The question in this case, therefore, is whether the transfers of shares, admittedly effected, so far as the deceased was concerned, on Mar. 30, 1943, and, therefore, before the critical date, were caught by the provisions to which I have referred so as to attract duty. There is no doubt, as my Lord has said, that on Mar. 30, 1943, the deceased did execute, under seal, instruments of transfer purporting in each case to transfer ten thousand shares in the company, the instruments of transfer complying strictly with the clause in the company's articles which states the manner in which shares are to be transferred. Furthermore, before Apr. 10, 1943, those transfers, and the relative share certificates, were duly delivered to the respective transferees or their agent. So far, all seems plain, but, as the property transferred consisted of shares in a company, a further event was necessary to perfect the legal title of the transferees, and that further event was the entry of the names of the transferees in the company's register of members as holders of the shares transferred.

By art. 9 of the company's articles of association

"The company shall be entitled to treat the person whose name appears upon the register in respect of any share as the absolute owner thereof, and shall not be under any obligation to recognise any trust or equity or equitable claim to or interest in such share, whether or not it shall have express or other notice thereof."

Article 28, dealing with transfers, provides:

"The instrument of transfer of any share in the company shall be in writing, and shall be executed both by the transferor and transferee, and duly attested, and the transferor shall be deemed to remain the holder of such share until the name of the transferee is entered in the register in respect thereof."

By art. 29:

"Shares in the company shall be transferred in the following form, or as near thereto as circumstances will permit . . ."

Then is set out the form of transfer used in the present case. Lastly, the articles contain provisions of a not unusual character restrictive of the transfer of shares. I need only refer to art. 33, the first sentence of which is in these terms:

"The directors may at any time, in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion and without assigning any reason, decline to register any proposed transfer of shares."

On the deceased executing the transfers and handing them over, together with the relative share certificates, to the transferees or their agent, the matter, then, stood thus. The deceased had done all in his power to divest himself of and to transfer to the transferees the whole of his rights, title and interest, legal and equitable, in the shares in question. He had, moreover, complied strictly with the procedure prescribed by the company's articles. Nevertheless, he had not transferred the full legal title, nor could he do so by the unaided operation of any instrument of his, for under the articles to which I have referred the company was only bound to recognise, and in fact would only recognise, the registered holder of a share, and none other, as the absolute owner of the share. The deceased had thus done all he could, in appropriate form, to transfer the whole of his interest, but so far as the legal title was concerned it was not in his power himself to effect the actual transfer of that, inasmuch as it could only be conferred on the transferees in its perfect form by registration of the transfers. But he had, in my judgment, transferred to the transferees the right to be placed on the register in his stead as the owners of the shares, subject to the directors' power to refuse registration.

That being the nature of the transactions, two questions arise: (i) When was the disposition or gift made? (ii) If it was made before Apr. 10, 1943, did the transferees forthwith (or at least before the last-mentioned date) assume possession or enjoyment under the gift and thenceforth retain the same to the entire exclusion of the deceased, or any benefit to him by contract or otherwise? As to the first question, with respect to those who have contended otherwise, it seems to me plain enough that this gift or disposition must have been made on the date when the deceased executed instruments of transfer and delivered them, with the certificates, to the transferees. After all, any transaction of gift imports a donor and a donee, a disposition by the donor and receipt of the subject-matter of the disposition by the donee. In this case, the only gift or disposition by the deceased, the only act of bounty on his part as regards either parcel of shares, took place before Apr. 10, 1943. This claim for duty could not have been made at all except on the footing that the transferees derived their beneficial title to these shares from a disposition or gift made by the deceased. To say that the gift was made on the date subsequent to Apr. 10, 1943, when the company's directors in fact registered the transfers, and was, therefore, dutiable, seems to me a quite untenable proposition, for the registration of the transfers was an act over the doing or refusing of which the deceased had no relevant control, and was, moreover, an act the doing of which he could not, consistently with his own deeds, oppose. In my view, the directors of the company, when they registered the transfers, registered them because, by virtue of the transfers, the transferees had become owners of the shares, and as such had become entitled to get in the legal estate by being put on the register in respect of the shares. The second question—i.e., whether the disposition or the gift operated to the entire exclusion of the transferor, and so forth—can be expressed alternatively by the question: Was this an incomplete gift which was only completed by the registration? That, I think, is the real basis of the Crown's contention. The Crown claims that this was an incomplete gift because until the moment of the registration of the transfers the company could not be compelled to recognise any other person than the deceased as the holder of the shares.

It seems to me that the formulation, in terms of an incomplete gift, of the character and effect of the disposition constituted by the execution of the transfers and delivery of them to the transferees with the certificates involves considerable difficulty. I can understand that in given circumstances a gift might, rightly or wrongly, be claimed to be incomplete because it could be recalled by the donor. If here it could be said that the deceased, had he changed his mind at any moment before registration, could, by the taking of appropriate proceedings, recall the transfers and recover the certificates and restrain the directors of the company from registering the transfers, then I would understand the proposition that the gift was incomplete, inasmuch as the property had never passed irrevocably to the donees. But that argument is disclaimed by the Crown, for reasons which I can well understand. It seems to me impossible to suppose that any such action could have been brought by the deceased in this case with any prospect of success. That contention having been disclaimed, it is said, on the part of the Crown, that nevertheless the gift is incomplete because, although the deceased could not recall it, he remained the owner of the shares until the transferees were registered in respect of them. That proposition seems to me to disregard entirely the form of the transfers. Indeed counsel for the Crown in the end said that the effect of the transfers was no more than some sort of conditional authority or promise that, if the directors of the company chose to register the transfers, then but not otherwise the transferees should become the owners of the shares. That is a proposition which I cannot accept, and it seems to me to read into the transfers, which are simple and straightforward documents, apt, as I think, to effect an immediate out-and-out transfer and nothing else, conditions of which the language of the documents themselves contains no trace whatever, for the purpose of bringing these transactions within the charge for duty. Accordingly, I adhere to the view I have already expressed, that these transfers were nothing more nor less than transfers of the whole of the deceased's title, both legal and equitable, in the shares, and all the advantages attached to the shares, as from the date on which he executed and delivered the transfers, subject, of course, as regards the legal title, to the provisions of the articles of association of the company as to registration, and to the directors' discretionary power to refuse registration.

If that was the effect of the transfers, what was the position between the delivery of the transfers and the actual registration of the transferees as the holders of the shares? Counsel for the Crown has referred us to the well-known case of Milroy v. Lord (1), which has been his sheet-anchor. He says that on this authority we must be forced to the conclusion that, pending registration, the transfers had no effect at all, and he arrives at that conclusion in this way. He says that these transfers, while purporting to be transfers of the property in the shares and not declarations of trust, did not transfer the property in the shares because registration was necessary in order to get in the legal title. He says further that being transfers purporting to be transfers of the property in the shares and failing of their effect as such for want of registration, they could, pending registration, have no operation at all because in Milroy v. Lord (1) it was held that a defective voluntary disposition purporting to operate as a transfer or assignment of the property in question would not be given effect to in equity as a declaration of trust. I agree with my Lord that Milroy v. Lord (1) by no means covers the question with which we have to deal in the present case. If the deceased had in truth transferred the whole of his interest in these shares so far as he could transfer the same, including such right as he could pass to his transferee to be placed on the register in respect of the shares, the question arises, what beneficial interest had he then left? The answer can only be, in my view, that he had no beneficial interest left whatever: his only remaining interest consisted in the fact that his name still stood on the register as holder of the shares, but, having parted in fact with the whole of his beneficial interest, he could not, in my view, assert any beneficial title by virtue of his position as registered holder. In other words, in my view the effect of this transaction, having regard to the form and the operation of the transfers, the nature of the property transferred, and the necessity for registration in order to perfect the legal title, coupled with the discretionary power on the part of the directors to withhold registration, must be that, pending registration, the deceased was in the position of a trustee of the legal title in the shares for the transferees. Thus in the hypothetical case put by the Crown of a dividend being declared and paid (as it would have been paid in accordance with the company's articles) to the deceased as registered holder, he would have been accountable for that dividend to the transferees, on the ground that by virtue of the transfers as between himself and the transferees the owners of the shares were the transferees, to the exclusion of himself.

In my view, to arrive at a right conclusion it is necessary to keep clear and distinct the position as between transferor and transferee and the position as between transferee and the company. It is, no doubt, true that the rights conferred by shares are all rights against the company, and it is, no doubt, true that, in the case of a company with ordinary regulations, no person can exercise his rights as a shareholder vis-à-vis the company, or be recognised by the company as a member, unless and until he is placed on the register of members. But, in my view, it is a fallacy from that to adduce the conclusion that there can be no complete gift of shares as between transferor and transferee unless and until the transferee is placed on the register. In my view, a transfer under seal in the form appropriate under the company's regulations, coupled with delivery of the transfer and certificate to the transferee, does suffice, as between transferor and transferee, to constitute the transferee the beneficial owner of the shares, and the circumstance that the transferee must do a further act in the form of applying for and obtaining registration in order to get in and perfect his legal title, having been equipped by the transferor with all that is necessary to enable him to do so, does not prevent the transfer from operating, in accordance with its terms as between the transferor and the transferee, and making the transferee the beneficial owner. After all, where duty is concerned the only relevant type of ownership is beneficial ownership, and the situation of the legal estate does not affect the question. For these reasons, as well as those given by my Lord, I am of opinion that the learned judge came to a right conclusion in this case, and that the shares comprised in these transfers did not attract duty on the death of the deceased.

MORRIS, L.J.: I am in agreement with the judgments which my Lords have delivered.

Appeals dismissed.

Solicitors: Solicitor of Inland Revenue; Merrimans and Withers & Co. (for the taxpayers).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re JENION (deceased). JENION AND OTHERS v. WYNNE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), March 21, 24, April 7, 1952.]

Legitimacy—Presumption of legitimacy—Rebutting evidence—Statements by mother during lifetime—Statements by natural father—Admissibility—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 32 (1) (2).

All the children of the intestate, who was married in 1900 and died on Nov. 14, 1949, were born during the lifetime of her husband. The intestate and her husband lived together for some years, but, in view of the intestate's association with one, J.R., her husband left her, and she thereafter lived with J.R. (who died in 1930) as his wife. On the question of the legitimacy of a child of the intestate, the court was asked to receive the evidence of a friend of the intestate (a cousin of J.R.) of statements made to him by the intestate to the effect that the child was not that of the intestate's lawful husband, and to admit birth certificates based on information supplied by the intestate which also indicated the child's illegitimacy. It was also sought to have admitted evidence of statements of J.R. to the effect that he was the father of the child in question.

HELD: (i) the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (1), had the effect, not only of rendering admissible the oral evidence of a spouse tending to bastardise a child born during wedlock, but also of rendering admissible evidence having that effect whatever form it took, and, therefore, the evidence offered ought to be admitted.

(ii) while the evidence of J.R. would be admissible as part of the res gestae, the statements would not be admissible as direct evidence of paternity as declarations against interest for in the circumstances that J.R. had assumed responsibility for the maintenance of all the children of the intestate, legitimate and illegitimate, his pecuniary interest was unaffected, nor could his statements satisfy the requirements as to admissibility on the ground that the fact was one of which he had peculiar or direct personal knowledge.

Per JENKINS, L.J.: Now that the direct evidence of a husband or wife as to non-access has been made admissible by s. 7 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, re-enacted in s. 32 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, his or her indirect evidence to the like effect, provided it is admissible in other respects, must also be admissible, inasmuch as the reason for its exclusion which formerly obtained has ceased with the abrogation of the rule in Russell v. Russell ([1924] A.C. 687) in relation to direct evidence.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1950, s. 32 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 417.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Bromage, [1935] Ch. 605; 104 L.J.Ch. 299; 153 L.T. 313; Digest Supp.
- (2) The Aylesford Peerage, (1885), 11 App. Cas. 1; 3 Digest 367, 80.
- (3) Russell v. Russell, [1924] A.C. 687; 93 L.J.P. 97; 131 L.T. 482; 27 Digest 297, 2743.
- (4) Mayo v. Mayo, [1948] 2 All E.R. 869; [1949] P. 172; [1949] L.J.R. 48; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Perring v. Perring & Simpson, [1949] 2 All E.R. 334; 113 J.P. 417; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Battle v. A.-G., [1949] P. 358; [1949] L.J.R. 1015; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Re Davy, [1935] P. 1; sub nom. Davy v. A.-G., 103 L.J.P. 115; 151 L.T. 562; Digest Supp.
- (8) Lloyd v. Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co., Ltd., [1914] A.C. 733; 83 L.J.K.B. 1054; 111 L.T. 338; 7 B.W.C.C. 330; revisg. sub nom. Ward v. Pitt (H.S.) & Co. Lloyd v. Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co., [1913] 2 K.B. 130; 82 L.J.K.B. 533; 108 L.T. 201; 22 Digest 100, 700.
- (9) Banbury Peerage Case, (1811), 1 Sim. & St. 153; 57 E.R. 62; 3 Digest 358, 2.
- (10) Morris v. Davies, (1837), 5 Cl. & Fin. 163; 7 E.R. 365; 3 Digest 359, 12.
- (11) Whitelocke v. Baker, (1807), 13 Ves. 510; 33 E.R. 385; 22 Digest 119, 935.
- (12) Atchley v. Sprigg, (1864), 33 L.J.Ch. 345; 10 L.T. 16; 3 Digest 360, 24.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of SIR LEONARD STONE, Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine Court of Lancaster, dated Oct. 8, 1951.

On Nov. 14, 1949, Robina Jenion died intestate, leaving six children. The defendant, Sarah Ann, the eldest surviving daughter, took out letters of administration, and, on her alleging that the other five children were illegitimate and that she was entitled to the whole estate, those five children began an administration action against her. The Vice-Chancellor held that the four youngest children were illegitimate, but, having rejected evidence of statements made by the intestate as to the legitimacy of the children, decided that in the case of the eldest surviving son, James William Jenion, the presumption of legitimacy was not rebutted, and, therefore, the defendant and James William Jenion, the second plaintiff, were entitled to equal shares in the estate.

Sir Lynn Ungood-Thomas, Q.C., and J. Turner, for the defendant, the administratrix.

Salt, Q.C., and A. O. Hughes for the second plaintiff, James William Jenion.

Curr. adv. vult.

April 7. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The late Robina Jenion, née Parker (hereafter called "the intestate"), was married on July 22, 1900, to William Henry Jenion, described in the marriage certificate as a carter. She was then eighteen years old, and her husband was twenty. She died on Nov. 14, 1949, having survived her husband by sixteen years. She left (perhaps surprisingly in the circumstances) an estate of the value of £2,400 and letters of administration to her estate were duly granted to the defendant.

It is not in dispute that, for some time, the intestate and her husband lived normally together in the city of Liverpool as husband and wife. At some date—and so far as it can be accurately ascertained it is of the utmost importance to fix it—one, James Rooney, a dock labourer, who had usurped her husband in the intestate's affections and enjoyed their advantages during the husband's absences at work, was caught by the husband in the intestate's embraces when the husband returned unexpectedly from work. The injured Mr. Jenion forthwith departed from the matrimonial home, and James Rooney stepped at once into his place. At some time—again the date is important in so far as it can be fixed—the two of them, James Rooney and the intestate, moved to No. 36, Prospect Street in the same city of Liverpool, and in that house the intestate remained at all material times during her life. The judgment of the Vice-Chancellor has established that the first, third and fourth plaintiffs were all (and there were more of them as well) issue of the union between the intestate and James Rooney. As to the last plaintiff, it appears that about 1925 James Rooney suffered the same fate which he had himself imposed on William Henry Jenion—he was himself supplanted in the intestate's affections by an Irish labourer, a lodger in their house—and the last plaintiff (according to the Vice-Chancellor) was the issue of the intestate by her Irish lover. It is not the least strange part of the somewhat squalid history that each one of the intestate's children, so far as the evidence goes, was registered (with variations to which I must later refer) as a child of a father of the name of Jenion, for it appears that, for this purpose—and, perhaps also to preserve appearances in Prospect Street—the succeeding partners of the intestate's life were content to be known in the district in which they lived by the intestate's married name of Jenion.

The story of the somewhat turbulent life of the intestate is, then, remarkable. If she was inconstant, she was prolific. The period of her child-bearing extended for about a quarter of a century. During this period she bore a large number of children. The exact number is unknown, but it is stated to have been not less than twelve or thirteen. Of this large number, the five plaintiffs and the defendant are the only known survivors, and the question raised in the proceedings was the simple one: Which of the six are entitled to participate in their mother's estate? The claim of the plaintiffs was that either they were all legitimate or all illegitimate, and that in any event (in the latter alternative by virtue of s. 9 (1) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926) all were entitled to share. The learned Vice-Chancellor had no difficulty in finding as a fact that the defendant was legitimate, but that all the plaintiffs (other than the second) were not, and so he held that the intestate's estate was equally divisible between the second plaintiff and the defendant. There is no appeal against any of the findings of the Vice-Chancellor save only his conclusion that the defendant failed to establish the illegitimacy of the second plaintiff. It is the case of the defendant that the only proper inference from the admissible evidence is that the second plaintiff was, like his co-plaintiffs, not the lawful child of the intestate and her husband, William Henry Jenion.

There is no doubt of the law to be applied. In the course of his careful judgment, the Vice-Chancellor quoted substantially from the judgment of LUXMOORE, J., in Re Bromage (1), and I need not repeat the citations. Since all the children born to the intestate were born in fact during the lifetime of her husband, William Henry Jenion, the onus is on the defendant in challenging the legitimacy of the second plaintiff to prove, and to prove beyond reasonable doubt, that at the time of his conception there was no access in fact by her husband to the intestate—no access, that is to say, in the sense in which in cases such as the present that word is used, no sexual intercourse between them. In the case of all the plaintiffs, save the second, the Vice-Chancellor so concluded, but as regards the second plaintiff the view of the Vice-Chancellor was that the admissible evidence fell short of what was required by the standards to which I have referred.

The relevant evidence before the Vice-Chancellor consisted of that of the defendant herself, one James Nugent (a police officer who was a second cousin of James Rooney), and Mrs. Barratt, a neighbour in Prospect Street. As regards Mrs. Barratt, she did not move to Prospect Street till 1914, and she could not, therefore, speak of events relative to the legitimacy of the second plaintiff, who was born on Oct. 22, 1911. As regards Mr. Nugent, the Vice-Chancellor stated that he regarded him as a reliable witness. He, Mr. Nugent, said that he began to visit the intestate and James Rooney and to see them regularly when he was "about twelve years of age". Since at the date of the trial (October, 1951) Mr. Nugent was fifty-three, this starting date (so to say) is taken back to about 1910. In the course of his judgment the Vice-Chancellor places this date at 1911, too late, having regard to the fact that the second plaintiff, according to the ordinary course of natural events, would be conceived in January, 1911, for the purpose of the defendant's case. Counsel for the defendant has criticised the judgment in regard to this piece of arithmetic, but, even if the Vice-Chancellor was unduly cautious in this matter, it is, I think, obvious that the commencing date of Mr. Nugent's experience is too imprecise to justify on that account alone this court in taking a different view from the Vice-Chancellor on the effect of the evidence as a whole.

As regards the defendant herself, her evidence consisted both of her recollections of early childhood and also of statements or declarations bearing directly on the matter in hand made in her presence both by the intestate and James Rooney. The Vice-Chancellor said that he regarded the defendant (who was, of course, materially interested in the result of the trial) as an unreliable witness. He also expressed the view that her evidence of declarations by the intestate and James Rooney (as also the evidence of Mr. Nugent of similar declarations) was wholly inadmissible. There is, to my mind, force in the criticism of counsel for the defendant that the Vice-Chancellor's rejection of the defendant's credibility (to some extent on the ground that her early youth, having been plainly unhappy, had also been forgotten) was related only to the recollection she expressed of her early infancy. I do not, however, think it right, having regard to what the Vice-Chancellor said of the defendant as a witness, for this court to give weight (save in so far as it is corroborated) to any part of the defendant's evidence. But there still remains the evidence of Mr. Nugent, regarded by the Vice-Chancellor as reliable, of like declarations. If, as the Vice-Chancellor held, such declarations were wholly inadmissible, there was little or nothing beyond the defendant's own evidence sufficient to distinguish the case of the second plaintiff from that of his co-plaintiffs, for the Vice-Chancellor regarded the various birth certificates produced before him as being (on the same principle as applied to the declarations) inadmissible as evidence of the facts stated therein or to be deduced therefrom in so far as they tended to disprove legitimacy..

As regards the plaintiffs (other than the second plaintiff) the Vice-Chancellor said:

"In my opinion these facts do establish that for many years before Sept. 20, 1926 [the date of the birth of the last of the intestate's children] there was no access to the body of the intestate by her husband. The circumstances in which she was living precluded any such act as being possible without a number of people knowing about it, and far from anyone knowing about any such thing the evidence is entirely negative. But the question remains: Since what date was such a state of affairs in existence ?

Mr. Nugent's visits to 36, Prospect Street only go back to 1911; Mrs. Barratt only came to live at No. 33 in 1914. There is no acceptable evidence as to when the intestate and James Rooney first went to live in Prospect Street as if they were man and wife."

As I think, however, the evidence given by Mr. Nugent of declarations made in his hearing is (if admissible) in all the circumstances sufficient to turn the scale and to answer the question posed by the Vice-Chancellor so as to place the beginning of the "state of affairs" to which he alludes beyond reasonable doubt, sufficiently prior to the conception of the second plaintiff as to justify the conclusion that (in accordance in fact with these declarations) the defendant is the only legitimate child of the intestate. As I have indicated, I accept the view of the Vice-Chancellor that once the menage at 36, Prospect Street began, the circumstances or "state of affairs" were such as to preclude any access to the body of the intestate by her husband being possible in fact. I do not forget that until the outbreak of the first world war it appears that William Henry Jenion still resided in Liverpool—in fact (for a time at least) with the mother of the intestate.

It is, therefore, said by counsel for the second plaintiff that, being so close in Liverpool, it is not unlikely that the intestate visited her mother's house, and, therefore, visited her husband from time to time after the separation. And I do not forget that the question is not whether husband and wife were, in ordinary language, separated, or whether they were on terms of amiability, but whether in fact the husband had access to the body of the wife. But Mr. Nugent, who knew both the intestate and his second cousin, James Rooney, intimately, deposed to the fact that when the intestate left Prospect Street and went visiting she was accompanied by Mr. Rooney, and I can see no ground for differing from the conclusion of the Vice-Chancellor, after hearing all the evidence, that once the establishment had been set up at Prospect Street there was, in fact, thereafter no access on the husband's part to the body of the intestate. It seems to me, therefore, that, if on proper evidence it is proved that the establishment in Prospect Street was set up sufficiently early to be prior to the date of the second plaintiff's conception, then there is no ground for distinguishing (and the Vice-Chancellor would not himself have distinguished) the case of the second plaintiff from that of his co-plaintiffs, or from concluding that, with reasonable certainty at the time of the second plaintiff's conception, there was in fact no access by the husband to the intestate's body.

In the circumstances it will, I think, be convenient first to consider whether the Vice-Chancellor was correct in his view that none of the declarations made by the intestate or by James Rooney was admissible at all as evidence in the present case, and I will first confine myself to the declarations attributed to the intestate. In my judgment, the Vice-Chancellor was incorrect in his conclusion that evidence of these declarations was inadmissible. On any view these declarations must, as I think, have been admissible on the issue of legitimacy as part of what is called the res gestae, i.e., evidence not of the facts stated in the declarations but of the fact that such statements were made. This conclusion follows, I think, inevitably from The Aylesford Peerage (2). I agree, however, that these declarations, if only admissible to that limited extent, must of necessity carry relatively little weight. In my opinion, however, the effect of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 7, now replaced by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32, is to make such declarations evidence directly of the facts therein stated. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (reproducing the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 7) provides:

"(1) Notwithstanding any rule of law, the evidence of a husband or wife shall be admissible in any proceedings to prove that marital intercourse did or did not take place between them during any period. (2) Notwithstanding anything in this section or any rule of law, a husband or wife shall not be compellable in any proceedings to give evidence of the matters aforesaid."

The argument of counsel for the second plaintiff, which was accepted by the Vice-Chancellor, was that s. 32 (1) only made admissible for the purpose specified evidence given orally by a husband or wife. In support of this argument he relied, first, on the opening formula: "Notwithstanding any rule of law", the effect of which is (he contended) to relax what he said was the general rule against the reception of evidence from a husband or wife relating to marital intercourse only to the extent of admitting such evidence when given orally in the witness box. Counsel found support for this view in s. 32 (2), which, according to its natural sense, could only be applicable to oral evidence. If this argument is correct, it follows that evidence of declarations made, whether oral or written, by a deceased husband or wife to prove the absence of marital intercourse, would remain (as the Vice-Chancellor held them to be) inadmissible to prove that fact.

I have reached a different conclusion. In my judgment, the natural interpretation of the language is that in any proceedings after the coming into force of the new legislation evidence of a husband or wife proving that marital intercourse did or did not take place during any period is admissible whatever form such evidence takes according to the ordinary rules of evidence. The words used are "the evidence" not "the oral evidence". To contrast evidence, on the one hand, with declarations, on the other, is to contrast the whole with that which it comprehends, for "declarations" are but a kind of evidence which may or may not be admissible according to the general rules of evidence. If the evidence of a husband or wife is admissible for the specified purpose, then I cannot think that such evidence was intended to be subject to some special limitation or not to be in other respects conformable to the general law so as to exclude, for example, the power of the court to admit under the Evidence Act, 1938, a written statement by a spouse suffering from mental incapacity. To have imposed on the evidence rendered admissible by s. 32 (1) limitations of that character would, in my view, have required clear words, and possibly an elaborate formula.

It has long been held that in pedigree cases hearsay evidence is admissible on the ground that on the nature of the case better evidence would not be available. In The Aylesford Peerage (2) it was clearly stated by the EARL OF SELBORNE (11 App. Cas. 10), that the written declarations of the deceased Lady Aylesford were not directly admissible to prove the illegitimacy of her child

"not . . . on the lis mota principle, but on the principle that the mother would not for that purpose have been a competent witness herself, if living."

In my judgment, if, as a result of the recent legislation, the mother has become for the purpose a competent witness, if living, it follows that the objections to the reception of her written declarations after her death are necessarily removed.

The "rule of law" referred to in the opening words of s. 32 (1) is the rule (and I take the language of the headnote in Russell v. Russell (3)),

"That neither a husband nor a wife is permitted to give evidence of non-intercourse after marriage to bastardise a child born in wedlock."

By the opening words of s. 32 (1) Parliament meant no more, in my view, than to say that, notwithstanding the existence of that rule (the authority of which as laid down by the courts it recognised up to the passing of the Act), the evidence of the husband or wife should thenceforth be admissible for the specified purpose of proving that marital intercourse did or did not during any period take place.

Nor do I think that the argument of counsel for the second plaintiff is assisted by s. 32 (2). It is true that s. 32 (2) can only relate to cases in which the husband or wife is living, and, therefore, capable of giving evidence orally and in person. But the sub-section is, in my opinion, only designed, naturally enough, to protect a husband or wife from the embarrassment and distaste of having to go into (and be cross-examined on) matters of such peculiar intimacy in a court of law, unless he or she is willing to undergo the ordeal. The obvious consideration underlying the sub-section can have no sensible relevance in the case of declarations by deceased spouses. Nor do I think, with all respect to him, that there is much substance in the Vice-Chancellor's fear that the view which I have formed is likely to cause to be agitated or re-agitated stale claims to titles or inheritances. As I have already stated, declarations of the kind here in question were always admissible as part of the res gestae and if any claim had been agitated before the passing of the new legislation its re-agitation would now be prevented, prima facie, by the doctrine of res judicata. I, therefore, conclude that, as a result of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, and the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, the evidence of Mr. Nugent (and of the defendant) of declarations made by the intestate to the effect that the second plaintiff was not her lawful child, are admissible as direct evidence of that fact. It follows also that whether or not Mayo v. Mayo (4) was at the time rightly decided: see Perring v. Perring & Simpson (5); the statements contained in the various birth certificates, for which the intestate was as informant responsible, are similarly admissible as evidence to the same effect.

As regards the declarations made by James Rooney that of all the children living at Prospect Street only the defendant was the child of William Henry Jenion, different considerations may apply. James Rooney's relationship to any of the plaintiffs was that of natural father, if, in fact, he or she was his child. In Battle v. A.-G. (6), HODSON, J., held, following the decision of LANGTON, J., in Re Davy (7), that declarations by the father of a man alleged to be the natural father of a particular individual were admissible in evidence on the question of that individual's legitimacy. Whether or not this is so, at least James Rooney's statements would, in my judgment, be admissible as part of the res gestae. His declarations would not, however, in my judgment, be admissible as direct evidence of paternity on the ground that they were declarations against interest, for at the time they were made Rooney was living at Prospect Street with the intestate as man and wife and had assumed responsibility for the maintenance of all the children legitimate and illegitimate alike, so that his pecuniary interest was, after the declarations, left exactly where it had been before. Nor does his statement: "I am the father" satisfy the condition that the fact is one of which he has peculiar or direct personal knowledge: see per HAMILTON, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Lloyd v. Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co., Ltd. (8) ([1913] 2 K.B., at p. 141). But the House of Lords in the same case ([1914] A.C. 733), while accepting the view of the Court of Appeal, held that declarations of a putative father were admissible on the issue of paternity as part of the res gestae. Still, as evidence of paternity, Rooney's declarations cannot in any case be of great weight, and I do not attach more significance to them than as lending some (though slight) corroboration to the declarations proved to have been made by the intestate.

It will be convenient first to refer to the birth certificates. The first birth recorded is that of a daughter born in August, 1902, in Rathbone Street, Liverpool. The name of the father is given as William Henry Jenion therein described as "labourer in dye works". It is not in dispute that this child was the lawful child of Mr. and Mrs. Jenion, and that she died in early infancy. The next is that of the defendant herself born in May, 1904. The father is described as William Henry Jenion, carter, and, as I have said, the Vice-Chancellor found as a fact that she was legitimate. There follow the birth certificates of the five plaintiffs, beginning with the birth of the second plaintiff in 1911 and ending with that of the fifth plaintiff in 1926, together with the certificates of the birth of four more children at various dates between 1911 and 1926, all of whom died in infancy. The birth of each of these nine children is recorded as having occurred at 36, Prospect Street, and in each case the occupation of the father is stated as having been that of a dock labourer, the occupation which was, according to the evidence, consistently followed by James Rooney. In every case the father's surname was given as Jenion, but it is, on the other hand, a significant fact that the father's Christian names in the case of the second plaintiff and of the child next born (a boy, John Joseph, who was born in 1913 and soon died) and also in the case of the fifth plaintiff, the last of the series, were given as William Henry, whereas in the case of the other six children the father's Christian name was given as "James". It is now admitted that by James Jenion was meant James Rooney, and the Vice-Chancellor held that the explanation of the use of the name William Henry Jenion in the case of the last plaintiff (who was the issue of the intestate's association with the Irish lodger) is to be found in the fact that in the circumstances the intestate was reluctant to use the name she had attributed to James Rooney and fell back on that of her lawful husband, though he had long since left Liverpool and was then, in fact, living in London, where he died.

The explanation of the use of the name of William Henry Jenion in the case of the first two children born in Prospect Street, the second plaintiff and John Joseph, is much more difficult. To the natural suggestion that it indicated the legitimacy in fact of the two boys it is objected that, though the intestate's husband followed more than one calling—"carter" and "labourer in dye works" have been already noted, and when he died in London he was described in the certificate of his death as a "bacon warehouseman"—he never at any time, according to the evidence, followed James Rooney's occupation of a dock labourer. Moreover, the date of the birth of the second child (June, 1913) and consequently the date of his conception were in any case after the time when, according to the Vice-Chancellor's findings, the establishment at Prospect Street had started and the "state of affairs" had arisen such as excluded access of William Henry Jenion to the body of the intestate. Counsel for the defendant has, accordingly, argued that the use of the name William Henry Jenion in the first two of these birth certificates signifies no more than that the intestate, for the purpose of registering the births of her children, clung for some time after she had wholly separated from her husband to the name of the man to whom she was married—as she reverted to it in 1926 after the birth of the offspring of her association with the Irish lodger. In my opinion, the evidence of these certificates taken as a whole tends rather to support the defendant's case than the contrary. But I agree with the Vice-Chancellor that this evidence, together with that of Mr. Nugent and of the defendant, but excluding the evidence of the declarations made by the intestate, corroborated (for what they are worth) by the declarations of James Rooney, would not suffice to discharge the onus laid on the defendant.

But, in my judgment, the case takes on an entirely different complexion when regard is had to the proved declarations of the intestate and James Rooney. I need not refer to the evidence itself, for it is quite clear from Mr. Nugent's evidence that statements were made to him both by the intestate (who, as he said, made no secret of the matter) and by James Rooney, before the birth of the last plaintiff, that all the children living at Prospect Street save "Cissy" (meaning the defendant) were their children, and that only "Cissy" was the lawful issue of the intestate's marriage. The defendant gave evidence no less clear of declarations made to her to the same effect both by her mother and by Rooney, and though, as I have said, the defendant was regarded as unreliable, particularly in her recollections of early childhood and the move to Prospect Street, in this respect she was at any rate corroborated by Mr. Nugent. And in judging of the significance of this evidence there is another (as I think) important matter. It is clear that, in addition to the children whose births were recorded in the certificates before the court, there was (amongst others) another child, Robina, born not long before the second plaintiff, who lived to maturity and was living at Prospect Street at the time the declarations were made to which Mr. Nugent and the defendant deposed. It is unfortunate that the birth certificate of this child, Robina, was not forthcoming. But, if the evidence of Mr. Nugent as regards the intestate's declaration to him (to refer only to this matter) is true—and the judge regarded him as a truthful witness, it follows that the children other than "Cissy" to whom the intestate alluded included a child born before the second plaintiff, and, therefore, that the Prospect Street establishment and the "state of affairs" to which the Vice-Chancellor referred originated at a date substantially anterior to the time when the second plaintiff must have been conceived.

On this evidence, therefore, when added to the other indications in the case, I feel, for my part, no doubt that the matter which the Vice-Chancellor obviously regarded as doubtful and difficult, but which he would, as I read his judgment, have decided otherwise than he did if the evidence which he excluded be admissible, must be resolved in the defendant's favour, that is, that on the issue of legitimacy no valid distinction can be drawn between the case of the second plaintiff and that of his co-plaintiffs—in other words, that the defendant has proved beyond reasonable doubt that the second plaintiff was not the lawful issue of the intestate. I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed and a declaration made to the effect that the defendant is the only lawful issue of the intestate and as such entitled solely to her estate.

JENKINS, L.J.: Robina Jenion (hereinafter called "the intestate") died in Liverpool a widow and intestate on Nov. 14, 1949, leaving her surviving the six parties to this action, of whom she was admittedly the mother. On Apr. 22, 1950, the defendant, Sarah Ann Wynne (formerly Jenion), was granted letters of administration to the estate of the intestate out of the Liverpool District Probate Registry, and she claimed to be beneficially entitled to the whole of the residuary estate on the ground that she was the only surviving lawful child of the intestate. In these circumstances the five plaintiffs commenced the present action in the Palatine Court of Lancaster contending that they also were lawful children of the intestate and claiming administration of her estate. The defendant, by her defence, denied the legitimacy of the five plaintiffs, who (in effect) alleged in reply that, if the plaintiffs and the defendant were not all of them lawful children of the intestate, then none of them was a lawful child of hers, an alternative state of facts which, if made good, would, having regard to the Legitimacy Act, 1926, s. 9, have produced the same result as if they had all been lawful children of the intestate, inasmuch as on this hypothesis the intestate would have left no legitimate issue her surviving. The formal issue when the matter came before the learned Vice-Chancellor, therefore, was (in effect) whether all or any and, if so, which of the six parties were lawful children of the intestate, but it appeared at the outset that the legitimacy of the defendant was in fact unquestionable, and the substantial issue, therefore, was whether in addition to the defendant all or any and, if so, which of the five plaintiffs were or was the lawful children or child of the intestate.

It is not in dispute that all five plaintiffs were born to the intestate during the subsistence of her marriage to one William Henry Jenion which took place on July 22, 1900. The defendant, unquestionably a child of this marriage, was born on May 26, 1904. Of the five plaintiffs the eldest, James William Jenion, was born on Oct. 27, 1911, and the youngest, Moireen Murphy (formerly Jenion) was born on July 21, 1926. The intestate's husband, William Henry Jenion, did not die until July 7, 1933. In these circumstances, there was a presumption with respect to each of the five plaintiffs that he or she was a lawful child of the marriage of the intestate to William Henry Jenion. As appears from the fifth answer of the judges in the Banbury Peerage Case (9), and the speech of LORD LYNDEHURST in Morris v. Davies (10), the citations from which contained in the passages from the judgment of LUXMOORE, J., in Re Bromage (1), referred to in the learned Vice-Chancellor's judgment in the present case, I need not repeat at length, this presumption is only to be rebutted by evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt that no sexual intercourse took place between the husband and the wife at any time when by such intercourse the husband could, by the laws of nature, be the father of the child; and (per LORD LYNTHURST, in Morris v. Davies (10) (5 Cl. & Fin. 265)):

“ . . . that presumption of law is not lightly to be repelled. It is not to be broken in upon, or shaken by a mere balance of probability; the evidence for the purpose of repelling it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory and conclusive.”

The learned Vice-Chancellor held (in effect) that on the admissible evidence in the present case the presumption of legitimacy was not rebutted as regards the plaintiff James William Jenion, but was rebutted as regards the other four plaintiffs, Joseph Jenion, Edith Jenion (now Coxon), Catherine Jenion (now Lee) and Moireen Jenion (now Murphy). Accordingly, by his order dated Oct. 8, 1951, the learned Vice-Chancellor declared that the plaintiff, James William Jenion, and the defendant were the persons who on the death of the intestate became entitled to any property of hers as to which she died intestate, and directed the usual administration accounts and inquiry, but, except as to the account of debts, not to be prosecuted without his leave in person. There is no appeal by the unsuccessful plaintiffs, but the defendant appeals (in effect) on the ground that the presumption of legitimacy should have been held rebutted as regards all the plaintiffs so as to leave the defendant solely entitled to the residuary estate of the intestate as the only legitimate child of the intestate her surviving. The contest is, therefore, now confined to the defendant and the plaintiff, James William Jenion, who is the only respondent, and the question in the appeal is whether the presumption of legitimacy was rightly held by the learned Vice-Chancellor not to have been rebutted in his case.

It will be convenient next to state the undisputed facts of the matter. As I have said, the intestate and William Henry Jenion were married on July 22, 1900. The certificate of their marriage describes him as William Henry Jenion, aged twenty, a bachelor, and by occupation a carter, and her as Robina Parker, aged eighteen, spinster, and both as of College Lane, Liverpool. The following births of children to the intestate were proved by certificate or from entries in the register: (1) On Aug. 23, 1902, at 14 Court Rathbone Street, Liverpool, Mary Esther, the father being described as William Henry Jenion, labourer in dye works. This child died in infancy. (2) On May 26, 1904, at 10 Rathbone Place, Liverpool (the defendant) Sarah Ann, the father being described as William Henry Jenion, carter. (3) On Oct. 27, 1911, at 36, Prospect Street, Liverpool (the plaintiff) James William, the father being described as William Henry Jenion, dock labourer. (4) On June 13, 1913, at 36, Prospect Street, Liverpool, John (since deceased), the father being again described as William Henry Jenion, dock labourer. (5) On Nov. 6, 1914, at 36, Prospect Street, Liverpool (the plaintiff), Edith, the father being described as James Jenion, dock labourer.

In all the remaining registrations of births the address is given as 36, Prospect Street, and in all of them (except the last) the father is described as James Jenion, dock labourer. The remaining registrations of births are:—(6) On July 23, 1916 (the plaintiff) Joseph. (7) On Aug. 21, 1919, Paul (since deceased). (8) On Dec. 27, 1920 (the plaintiff) Catherine. (9) On Sept. 22, 1922, Hugh (since deceased). (10) On July 24, 1924, Constance Ann (since deceased). (11) On July 21, 1926 (the plaintiff) Moireen, the father in this case being once more described as William Henry Jenion, dock labourer. This formidable list of registered births admittedly does not include all the intestate's children; and, in particular, it is common ground that there was a daughter, Robina, no registration of whose birth has been traced, but who was born in 1908 or 1909 and died at the age of about twenty. As I have said, William Henry Jenion, the husband of the intestate, died on July 7, 1933. The certificate of his death shows him to have died in London and states his occupation at that time as

"bacon warehouseman". At some date between the birth of the defendant at 10, Rathbone Place on May 26, 1904, and the birth of the plaintiff, James William Jenion, at 36, Prospect Street on Oct. 27, 1911, the intestate parted company with her husband and set up house at 36, Prospect Street with one James Rooney, a dock labourer, and she and Rooney lived together at that address as man and wife for many years, i.e., down to the death of James Rooney in 1930, or at all events down to a date subsequent to the birth on July 21, 1926, of the plaintiff Moireen Murphy. There seems to be no doubt that during the Prospect Street period James Rooney commonly used the name of Jenion in place of Rooney and was accepted by the neighbourhood generally as the intestate's husband "James Jenion".

The learned Vice-Chancellor held, and I see no reason for differing from him in this, that the evidence sufficed to rebut the presumption of legitimacy as regards the children of the intestate conceived after the date on which the intestate and Rooney had set up house together at 36, Prospect Street, inasmuch as there was on the evidence no reasonable possibility of the intestate's husband having had access to her after that date. That finding clearly concluded the case against all the plaintiffs other than James William Jenion, for there is no doubt that the intestate and Rooney had set up house together at 36, Prospect Street before his birth on Oct. 27, 1911, and the eldest of the remaining plaintiffs, Edith, was not born until Nov. 6, 1914. But had the intestate and Rooney set up house together at 36, Prospect Street before the date at which in the ordinary course of events the plaintiff James William Jenion must have been conceived, that is, in January, 1911? The learned Vice-Chancellor held (in effect) that the admissible evidence did not suffice to prove this beyond reasonable doubt.

So far as material for the present purpose, the evidence before the learned Vice-Chancellor and the questions of admissibility arising thereon were as follows: (i) The oral evidence of the defendant as to (a) events within her own recollection and (b) statements made to her by the intestate and by Rooney. The learned Vice-Chancellor did not regard the defendant as a reliable witness in either respect, and held that in any case her evidence as to statements made to her by the intestate was inadmissible as those statements tended to bastardise the intestate's children born during her marriage and were, therefore, inadmissible on the principle stated in Russell v. Russell (3), notwithstanding s. 7 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, and the re-enactment of sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2) of that section contained in s. 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. The learned Vice-Chancellor did not, I think, express any opinion as to the admissibility of the defendant's evidence of statements made to her by Rooney. (ii) The oral evidence of one James Nugent, a police constable and second cousin of James Rooney. The learned Vice-Chancellor accepted his evidence as reliable. It included evidence of statements made to the witness by the intestate (which the learned Vice-Chancellor held to be inadmissible on the ground above stated) and also of statements made to him by Rooney to which the learned Vice-Chancellor referred in his judgment, without, I think, expressing any view as to their admissibility. (iii) The oral evidence of a Mrs. Barratt, whose knowledge only went back to 1914, and whose evidence, therefore, had no material bearing on the legitimacy of the plaintiff, James William Jenion, apart from her account of a conversation or conversations with the intestate to which counsel for the plaintiff, James William Jenion, attached some importance. (iv) Documentary evidence in the shape of the birth certificates and entries in the register of births. Inasmuch as the intestate herself was the informant in all these cases the learned Vice-Chancellor held this evidence to be inadmissible on the ground already stated in so far as it tended to bastardise any of the plaintiffs.

Before considering the evidence in greater detail, I will deal with the question of the admissibility of the evidence of the defendant and Mr. Nugent as to the statements made to them by the intestate, of the documentary evidence of statements made by her in the shape of the registered particulars of the births of her children, and of the evidence given by the same two witnesses as to statements made by Rooney. So far as the statements (oral or documentary) by the intestate herself are concerned the law, as I understand it, may be thus summarised: (i) statements oral or documentary made by a deceased person de jure related by blood or marriage to a particular family on questions concerning the pedigree of that family are admissible in evidence under an exception made, owing to the necessity of such cases, from the general rule as to the inadmissibility of hearsay evidence; but (ii) direct evidence of a husband or wife (by which expression I mean evidence given by a husband or wife in person in a judicial proceeding, whether orally or by affidavit or by any other means permitted under the relevant rules of procedure) tending to bastardise a child born to the wife during the subsistence of his or her marriage, was formerly inadmissible on the principle stated in Russell v. Russell (3), but was made admissible by the Law Reform Act, 1949, s. 7 (1), now re-enacted as the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (1). (iii) On the same principle, down to the commencement of the Law Reform Act, 1949, the indirect evidence of a husband or wife (by which expression I mean evidence of the terms of some statement oral or documentary made by the husband or wife dehors the relevant judicial proceeding and proved in such judicial proceeding by the evidence of some third party, or, in the case of a document proving itself, by production of the document) though admissible in other respects (for example, as a statement by a deceased husband or wife as to pedigree, or as an admission by a living husband or wife as party to an action) was inadmissible in so far as it tended to the result mentioned in (ii) above.

This leaves open the question whether such indirect evidence of a husband or wife, if admissible in other respects, has now been made admissible notwithstanding the rule in Russell v. Russell (3) by the statutory provisions above referred to which have clearly abrogated that rule so far as the direct evidence of a husband or wife is concerned. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (1) and (2), re-enacting the Law Reform Act, 1949, s. 7 (1) and (2), provide:

“(1) Notwithstanding any rule of law, the evidence of a husband or wife shall be admissible in any proceedings to prove that marital intercourse did or did not take place between them during any period. (2) Notwithstanding anything in this section or any rule of law, a husband or wife shall not be compellable in any proceedings to give evidence of the matters aforesaid.”

It is reasonably plain that these provisions are in terms appropriate to direct evidence given by the husband or wife personally in the proceedings in question orally or by affidavit or other permitted means rather than to secondary evidence of some statement or admission made by him or her dehors the proceedings. Nevertheless, I think the right view must be that this statutory abrogation of the rule in Russell v. Russell (3) as regards the direct evidence of a husband or wife necessarily had the effect of also abrogating the rule with respect to such indirect evidence of a husband or wife as would have been admissible apart from the rule. In The Aylesford Peerage case (2) the EARL OF SELBORNE said (11 App. Cas. 9):

“We know that unless given post litem motam and for a special purpose which might exclude them, the declarations of deceased members of a family (and I am not at all aware that the mother would be excluded) are admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving relationship. Therefore, declarations of that kind by the mother would have been admissible on that principle, if not excluded upon the other principle; and the Vice-Chancellor held that such declarations could not be received for the purpose of proving the legitimacy of the child, which was in controversy; not, as I understand, on the lis mota principle, but on the principle that the mother would not for that purpose have been a competent witness herself, if living. I accede to that . . .”

This passage seems to me to show that the only reason why the indirect evidence of a deceased husband or wife admissible in other respects was inadmissible in so far as it tended to bastardise children born during his or her marriage was that the husband or wife if living would not have been competent to give evidence to the like effect. In other words, while the rule stood, to admit the indirect evidence of a husband or wife as to non-access would have been to admit in indirect form evidence which in direct form would not have been admissible. It seems to me to follow that now that the direct evidence of a husband or wife as to non-access has been made admissible by statute his or her indirect evidence to the like effect, provided it is admissible in other respects, must also be admissible, inasmuch as the reason for its exclusion which formerly obtained has ceased with the abrogation of the rule in Russell v. Russell (3) in relation to direct evidence. Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex.

Accordingly, I think that the evidence of the defendant and of Mr. Nugent in the present case as to the terms of statements made to them by the intestate which tend to show what issue she had of her marriage to William Henry Jenion is admissible as evidence of the truth of the facts so stated by the intestate, even though such statements also tend to bastardise children born during her marriage to him, because (i) they are statements concerning the pedigree of the Jenion family made by a person competent to make them as the wife of William Henry Jenion and the mother of the legitimate issue of her marriage to him; and (ii) the objection to their admissibility in so far as they tend to bastardise children born during her marriage to William Henry Jenion, which would, undoubtedly, have excluded them before the commencement of the Law Reform Act, 1949, based as it was on the inability of the intestate if living to have given direct evidence to the like effect, has been abrogated by s. 7(1) of that Act as now re-enacted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (1).

The learned Vice-Chancellor, who took a different view, considered (in effect) that these statutory provisions only abrogated the rule in Russell v. Russell (3) to the extent of admitting the direct evidence of a living husband or wife, and that to treat them as extending to admit the indirect evidence of a deceased husband or wife, in the form of statements made before the change in the law, would be to give them a retroactive effect which he declined to attribute to them. He was impressed by the possibility of the re-opening of old pedigree and peerage cases if the change in the law was held to make admissible such past and previously inadmissible statements. To my mind, the admissibility of such indirect evidence follows, for the reasons I have endeavoured to state, from the admissibility of direct evidence to the like effect. As to the danger of re-opening past controversies, I confess I am less impressed by this possibility than the learned Vice-Chancellor seems to have been, and in any case the admissibility of evidence for any particular purpose in any particular proceeding must, in my view, be judged by reference to the law of evidence as it stands at the date at which the question of admissibility falls to be determined. Thus, under the Evidence Act, 1938, a written statement by a deceased person complying with the various conditions of admissibility prescribed by the Act would, I apprehend, be admissible in any proceedings taken after the commencement of the Act, although it was made, and the person making it died, before such commencement, and although as the law stood when it was made, and when the person making it died, it would not have been admissible.

A point was sought to be made of the provision in s. 32 (2) to the effect that a husband or wife is not to be compellable to give evidence of the kind mentioned in sub-s. (1). Therefore, it was suggested, indirect evidence of a deceased husband or wife to the effect mentioned in sub-s. (1) could not be admissible because he or she would not have been compellable to give direct evidence to the like effect. But, in my view, competence, not compellability, is the test. The question here is not whether a living spouse can be compelled to give evidence, but whether a statement in fact made by a deceased spouse can be received in evidence, and the answer to that question must, in my view, depend on whether he or she could have given direct evidence to the like effect if living, and not on whether he or she could have been compelled to do so. The admissibility of the birth certificates, so far as they are to be regarded as statements by the intestate, follows by parity of reasoning from what I have said above with regard to her oral statements.

A Different considerations apply to Rooney's statements. He was not related to the Jenion family, but was a mere interloper. It would appear, therefore, that the "pedigree" exception to the general rule as to the exclusion of hearsay evidence does not strictly apply to his case, and, as at present advised, I am not satisfied that the extension of the exception which has been allowed in cases under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, to declarations of deceased putative relations, or allegedly putative relations, of the person seeking a declaration of legitimacy (as to which see Re Davy (7); Battle v. A.-G. (6)) is applicable here, though I find it unnecessary to express any concluded opinion on the point for the purpose of deciding the present case. It was suggested in the course of the argument (I think I was myself responsible for the suggestion) that Rooney's statements, in so far as they were admissions of his paternity of the children born at 36, Prospect Street, might be admissible as declarations against interest, as being calculated to involve him in financial liability for their maintenance, but this view does not appear to be tenable having regard to the case in this court of Lloyd v. Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co., Ltd. (8), and particularly the passage in the judgment of the court delivered by HAMILTON, L.J. ([1913] 2 K.B. 141). It is true that the actual decision was reversed in the House of Lords, but their Lordships appear to have accepted the view that the statements of the deceased putative father were not admissible as declarations against interest, and to have admitted them, not as evidence of their truth, but on the ground that the fact that they were made was evidence of conduct on the part of the putative father which showed him to have believed himself to be the father of the unborn child. In other words, the statements were admitted, not as evidence of their truth, but as part of the res gestae.

E Accordingly, in my view, evidence of the terms of any statements made by the intestate is admissible as evidence of the truth of the facts stated by her, though tending to bastardise children born during her marriage; but I propose to proceed on the footing that evidence of the terms of any statements made by Rooney as to his paternity of the children born at 36, Prospect Street is not admissible as evidence of the truth of the facts stated by him. The statements said to have been made by Rooney were, of course, oral statements and, therefore, not within s. 1 of the Evidence Act, 1938, which, moreover, by s. 6 (2) (b) would, it seems, on a strict application of the rule in pedigree cases, have excluded even a written statement by him concerning the pedigree of the Jenion family.

F It was argued that the statements of the intestate and Rooney, even if not admissible as evidence of their truth, were nevertheless admissible in evidence as part of the res gestae, and reference was made for this purpose to The Aylesford Peerage (2), to which may be added Lloyd v. Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co., Ltd. (8). The principle underlying this ground of admissibility is thus stated by the EARL OF SELBORNE in The Aylesford Peerage (2) (11 App. Cas. 10):

H "But I cannot hold that a letter otherwise admissible, which is an important act of conduct done by the mother, is to be excluded in whole or in part (if it were possible to divide one part from the other) because it may contain such declarations. These declarations are facts as well as statements. It is a fact that for some purpose or other the mother wrote a letter containing such statements at such a time. Your Lordships will not take them as proving the fact; but the fact that the mother did write such a letter, at such a time and for such a purpose, as it appears to me, is a thing which, on the principles which were certainly acted upon in Morris v.

Davies (10) (and which appear to me to be sound principles, and quite consistent with the rule), ought not to be excluded from consideration."

If I am right in my view as to the admissibility of the intestate's statements as evidence of their truth, this alternative ground of admissibility only requires consideration as regards Rooney's statements. I confess I am in doubt as to the precise extent and effect of this rule, particularly in its application to a mere statement of fact regarding the paternity of a child made many years after the event. Before the abrogation of the rule in Russell v. Russell (3) evidence that a deceased married woman had said: "The children born during my marriage were not my husband's but another man's" would not have been admissible to prove the truth of that statement. How, then, could it advance the matter to admit the same evidence, not as proof of the truth of the statement, but as proof of the fact that, true or false, the woman did make it? To adduce from the fact that it was made that the woman would have been unlikely to make it if it was not true, and, therefore, that it was probably true, would have amounted to nothing less than doing indirectly the very thing the rule forbade, that is, admitting the woman's statement by a circuitous route as evidence tending to bastardise her children born in wedlock. But short of this, what evidential value could it have? So far as I can see, none, except in the purely negative sense that the statement did not contradict any inference of illegitimacy which might be deducible from the other evidence in the case. Statements evidencing (for example) a course of conduct in relation to the arrangements made for the birth, maintenance and upbringing of the child, or to the treatment accorded to the child in later years, are obviously in a quite different category. As to Rooney's statements treated as part of the res gestae (if it be right so to treat them) they can, in my view, carry the matter no further than this, that Rooney did not in these statements contradict any inference as to his paternity of the children born at 36, Prospect Street which can properly be drawn from the other evidence in the case, but on the contrary showed that (rightly or wrongly) he believed himself to be their father, a circumstance which, in my view, can add virtually nothing to the other evidence in the case.

The defendant's evidence as to her early years at 36, Prospect Street, was confused, both as to dates and as to the number and ages of the children in existence at any given time, and I am not surprised that the learned Vice-Chancellor regarded it as unreliable. It is clear, however, that at the time of her earliest recollection her home was 36, Prospect Street, and, although she suggested that some distinction between her and the other children was made (inferentially a distinction between the Jenion child, on the one hand, and the Rooney children, on the other), the learned Vice-Chancellor's conclusion from her evidence and that of the plaintiff, James William Rooney, was to the effect "that all the intestate's children from time to time surviving were brought up at 36, Prospect Street", and "that James Rooney was the man of the house and was called father by all the children including the defendant".

The more material points in the defendant's evidence were these: (i) that she had never in her life seen William Henry Jenion either at 36, Prospect Street or elsewhere: (ii) that when the defendant was about sixteen, the intestate told her that the intestate and William Henry Jenion had ceased to live together when the defendant "was a baby", and also told her of what was apparently an amorous intrigue between the intestate and Rooney, which seems to have gone on for a while undiscovered by William Henry Jenion, who, however, did ultimately discover it, whereupon he "walked out and never came back again"; and Rooney "went and lived with" the intestate: (iii) that at about the same period the intestate told the defendant that the defendant's father lived in London and worked for Liptons as a carter: (iv) that the intestate told her that Rooney was the father of all the children other than the defendant. She could not be certain of the date of this statement, but thought it was probably when she was twenty-one: (v) that on an occasion apparently about 1926 she had a meeting with Rooney, who was in a state of agitation, because, according to him, he had found a strange man (not the intestate's husband) in bed with the intestate, and in the course of the interview told the defendant that he was not her father but that he was the father of all the other children.

- A Police-constable Nugent's evidence was to the effect that he was Rooney's second cousin, and that he had known Rooney since he (the witness) was about three years of age; that so long as he had known Rooney "he was living in Prospect Street with a Mrs. Jenion"; but that the witness's first personal recollection of visiting 36, Prospect Street and seeing Rooney and Mrs. Jenion there was when he was about twelve years of age (i.e., the witness having been born in 1898, about 1910); that he never saw any man other than Rooney who appeared to be on terms of intimacy with Mrs. Jenion; that he had never met William Henry Jenion; and that Rooney used to visit the witness's mother and father, always accompanied by Mrs. Jenion. Police constable Nugent also deposed to an occasion shortly after his demobilisation in 1920 from service in the first world war, when Rooney had told him that he (Rooney) was not the father of the defendant but was the father of all the other children. Police constable C Nugent also said (and this is more important) that (apparently at about the same period) the intestate told him that she was living with Rooney but that her husband's name was Jenion; and (to give what I take to be the combined effect of a number of answers by the witness) that the defendant and a child who died were the only children she had by Jenion, and that Jenion "was down in London", which was what Rooney had also told the witness as to Jenion's whereabouts. D The only passage in Mrs. Barratt's evidence which need be referred to relates to a conversation she said she had with the intestate at some time after moving to Prospect Street in or about 1914. According to Mrs. Barratt, Mrs. Jenion said that she was married to a man by the name of Jenion and that she lived with her mother in Stanhope Street in the south end of Liverpool.

- E On the footing that the intestate's statements are admissible as evidence of the truth of the facts stated, I would have little hesitation in holding the presumption of legitimacy rebutted in the case of the plaintiff, James William Jenion, as well as in the cases of the other four plaintiffs, if the defendant's evidence on the points mentioned above could be accepted in its entirety. But the matter is complicated by the decidedly adverse view which (as already mentioned) the learned Vice-Chancellor formed of the defendant's evidence. As F I understand his judgment, he, in effect, rejected in its entirety as wholly unreliable all her evidence as to statements made to her by her mother, quite apart from the question of the admissibility of such statements if made. The one point on which he seems to have accepted her evidence was the fact that, so far as she knew, she had never seen William Henry Jenion. It follows, in my view, that, except on this one point, the whole of the defendant's evidence must be ignored for the purposes of the present appeal.

- G How does the matter then stand? The whole of the circumstances point to a complete and permanent breach between the intestate and her husband on account of her relations with Rooney, followed by her setting up house with Rooney at 36, Prospect Street in circumstances excluding any reasonable possibility of access to her by the husband, quite apart from the obvious improbability of his desiring or seeking such access so long as her association with Rooney continued. H Police constable Nugent, whose evidence the learned Vice-Chancellor did accept, first saw the intestate and Rooney at No. 36, Prospect Street when he was about twelve, that is to say, about 1910. The learned Vice-Chancellor puts it at about 1911, but I see no ground for this. When a reliable witness says "about 1910" I think one can fairly take the date as between late 1909 and early 1911. Thus, his evidence does not exclude the possibility that the intestate and Rooney had only just set up house together at No. 36 when he first saw them there, that he first saw them there in the first half of 1911, but after January in that year, and that James William Jenion had, therefore, been conceived before they had set up house together at No. 36, and, consequently, before the date as from which the possibility of further access to the intestate by her husband can be considered as for all practical purposes excluded. Other passages in Police constable Nugent's evidence seem to suggest that Rooney's association with the intestate as man and wife had been going on for some time before he first visited them at No. 36, but it must be admitted that the matter is so far not placed beyond reasonable doubt. But it seems to me that all reasonable doubt is really resolved by the intestate's statement to Nugent, which, for the reasons above indicated, I hold to be admissible, to the effect that the defendant and one other child who died were her only children by her husband William Henry Jenion. This statement must be considered in the light of the fact that the child Robina, born in 1908 or 1909, was in existence at the date when it was made. The intestate was thus saying in effect that Robina and all the children born after her were not William Henry Jenion's children but Rooney's. She could only have been mistaken about this as regards Robina on the footing that at the date of the conception of Robina she was carrying on clandestine sexual relations with Rooney while still living with her husband. But to make out the possibility of a mistake on her part as regards the child whose legitimacy is actually now in question, namely, the plaintiff, James William Jenion, one would have to assume that the intestate, while still living with her husband, was indulging in clandestine intercourse with Rooney for a period of as long as two or three years down to January, 1911, and that her husband did not discover this, and leave her on the strength of it, until after the conception in January, 1911, of the plaintiff James William Jenion. This hypothesis is, I think, too improbable to merit acceptance.

I would add that I think the defendant's evidence to the effect that, so far as she knew, she had never seen her father, William Henry Jenion, points in the same direction. The defendant was six-and-a-half in January, 1911. The learned Vice-Chancellor declined "to accept as in any way reliable her evidence of events at that time", but I should have thought that, if her father had in fact been living with her mother until she was as old as six-and-a-half and had then left, the defendant would in all probability have remembered it. As already indicated I do not think Rooney's statements (if admissible, not as evidence of their truth, but as part of the res gestae) can have any effect except in the negative sense that they are not inconsistent with, and indicate, for what little it is worth, a belief on the part of Rooney consistent with the conclusion against the legitimacy of the plaintiff, James William Jenion, to which the other evidence seems, in my view, to lead. The passage from Mrs. Barratt's evidence to which I have referred, and on which counsel for the plaintiff, James William Jenion, placed considerable reliance, cannot, in my view, alter the result. "Lived" in the intestate's statement as reported could equally well mean "lived before she was married to him" or "lived when she first met him" as "lived at the date of her statement to Mrs. Barratt" and might even mean "used to live when they were living together". Even if the meaning assumed by counsel is the right one, inasmuch as William Henry Jenion's leaving his wife was due to his having been ousted by Rooney, I do not think his residence in Liverpool, even with the intestate's mother, as opposed to his residence in London, would appreciably have altered the position as regards possibility of access, with which geographical considerations had in this particular case very little to do.

There remain the birth certificates. The circumstance that the plaintiff James William Jenion's father is named in his birth certificate as "William Henry Jenion", even with the somewhat suggestive description of "dock labourer", would be strongly in his favour, were it not for the fact that the same names and description were given in the case of John, who, born on June 13, 1913, must have been illegitimate, and reverted to in the case of Moireen, born on July 21, 1926, who also must have been illegitimate. In view of this, however, I cannot regard the plaintiff James William Jenion's birth certificate as assisting one way or the other on the issue of his legitimacy. For these reasons I am of opinion that the presumption of the plaintiff James William Jenion's legitimacy is rebutted by evidence establishing the contrary beyond reasonable doubt, and I would accordingly allow this appeal.

- A MORRIS, L.J.: The contest which arose in this administration action concerned the status at birth of six of the children of the intestate. The learned Vice-Chancellor decided that the defendant and the second plaintiff were legitimate, but that the others were not. The others have not appealed, but the defendant, who is the appellant, has challenged the correctness of the decision that the second plaintiff, James William Jenion, the respondent, was legitimate.
- B No criticism of the general approach of the learned Vice-Chancellor can be made. He bore fully in mind that the presumption of the legitimacy of a child born during wedlock "is not lightly to be repelled". As LORD LYNDHURST said in Morris v. Davies (10) (5 Cl. & Fin. 265):

- C "It is not to be broken in upon, or shaken by a mere balance of probability; the evidence for the purpose of repelling it must be strong, distinct, satisfactory and conclusive."

- The useful citation made by the Vice-Chancellor from the judgment of LUXMOORE, J., in Re Bromage (1), served to emphasise the burden to be discharged in proving illegitimacy. As applied to the present case, it would not suffice to show that the intestate was having intercourse with or was living with a man other than
- D her husband, but it would have to be demonstrated to the satisfaction of a judge or jury that no sexual intercourse took place between the intestate and her husband at any time when by such intercourse the husband could by the laws of nature be the father of the child in question.

- In my judgment, the chief points of substance which are raised in this appeal are: (i) whether the evidence of statements made by the intestate concerning
- E the paternity of her children were admissible in proof of the truth of what was said, and (ii) whether, if they were, the decision in the action concerning the second plaintiff should have been different. I regard these as being the points of real importance for the reason that, if contentions advanced on behalf of the defendant as to other aspects of the case are held to be valid, I do not consider that they would also be decisive. It was, for example, submitted that the learned
- F Vice-Chancellor was in error when he said that Mr. Nugent's visits to 36, Prospect Street only went back to 1911. Mr. Nugent said that he was fifty-three years of age at the time of the hearing in October, 1951: he was not asked the date of his birth. His recollection was that he was "about twelve" when he first saw the intestate and Rooney together in Prospect Street: he thought that it would be "about 1910". Having regard to the vagueness of this piece of evidence I
- G do not consider that the case of the defendant is advanced even if it were thought that some possible slight measure of error was established.

- Again, it was submitted that even if the evidence as to the intestate's statements was not admissible in proof of the truth of what was said, the statements should have been admitted as part of the res gestae. In The Aylesford Peerage (2) the Committee of Privileges admitted on this basis certain declarations made
- H in letters written by Lady Aylesford. The facts in that case in reference to the letters were very different from any facts in the present case concerning the intestate's statements. Indeed, in the present case any probative value to be derived from the evidence that the intestate said that some of her children were illegitimate is either negligible or is non-existent if what was said is to be disregarded. There is no virtue in knowing the fact that the intestate said that some of her children were illegitimate if no dependence must be placed on what was said. Evidence of a bald and isolated declaration not linked with evidence of conduct and action gives no guidance to the truth if no heed may be paid to the declaration itself. In the circumstances of this case, if, as was technically possible, the judicial mind was entitled to be receptive of evidence of the fact that the intestate said certain things, it was at once obligatory to jettison practically the whole of what was received, unless the evidence could be accepted as tending to prove the truth of what was said.

It becomes necessary to consider the bearing as regards the present case of the change in the law enacted in 1949. Notwithstanding any rule of law the evidence of a husband or wife is now admissible in any proceedings to prove that marital intercourse did or did not take place between them during any period. Assuming that the statements of the intestate tended towards such proof, were they admissible? The evidence that certain statements were made was given by Mr. Nugent and also by the defendant. I cannot regard the evidence of either of these as being the evidence of the "wife", i.e., the intestate, in the proceedings. The language of the new provision now re-enacted as s. 32 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, has reference to the testimony of a living spouse. There is further indication that this is so in sub-s. (2) where it is provided that a spouse is not to be compelled to give such evidence.

At the hearing before the Vice-Chancellor neither the husband nor the wife was available to give evidence and neither could give evidence and neither did give evidence. The new enactment did not, therefore, have operation in regard to a living spouse in the witness box. The matter does not, however, rest there. To the general rule that statements made by those not called as witnesses are inadmissible to prove the truth of the facts stated there are certain well-recognised exceptions. One of these is that statements made by deceased relatives are admissible to prove matters of pedigree provided that they were made ante litem motam. In Whitelocke v. Baker (11) LORD ELDON, L.C., said (13 Ves. 514):

"... declarations in the family, descriptions in wills, descriptions upon monuments, descriptions in Bibles, and registry books, all are admitted upon the principle, that they are the natural effusions of a party, who must know the truth; and who speaks upon an occasion, when his mind stands in an even position, without any temptation to exceed or fall short of the truth."

The statements to be admitted must, however, be statements that the deceased if living could make in the witness box. Thus, in The Aylesford Peerage (2) the EARL OF SELBORNE said (11 App. Cas. 9):

"In Atchley v. Sprigg (12) the Vice-Chancellor excluded declarations which I understand to have been made, not in the witness-box, but during her life, by the mother who was deceased, and which were offered, I presume, for the purpose of showing that the child was her child. We know that unless given post litem motam and for a special purpose which might exclude them, the declarations of deceased members of a family (and I am not at all aware that the mother would be excluded) are admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving relationship. Therefore, declarations of that kind by the mother would have been admissible on that principle, if not excluded upon the other principle; and the Vice-Chancellor held that such declarations could not be received for the purpose of proving the legitimacy of the child, which was in controversy; not, as I understand, on the lis mota principle, but on the principle that the mother would not for that purpose have been a competent witness herself, if living. I accede to that..."

Applying the reasoning of that passage to the present case, it would appear that as the intestate, if she had been living in 1951, could in some appropriate proceedings, e.g., in a legitimacy suit, have given evidence that she did not have marital intercourse during a particular period with her husband, the result follows that after her death evidence could be given of her having made a statement to such effect.

A As against this point of view two considerations were urged. In the first place it was submitted that, as a living spouse was competent, but not compellable, to give evidence, the statement ought not to be heard of a deceased spouse who would in the nature of things not have an opportunity to exercise any option whether evidence of a statement should be given. In the second place, it was submitted that evidence should not be received of a statement made many years ago and at a time when the author of the statement could not have been heard to give evidence to the effect of the statement. The new statutory provision is introduced with the words "Notwithstanding any rule of law". It is arguable that the legislature had in contemplation a rule stated in broad terms to the effect that the declarations of a husband or wife should not be admissible to bastardise children born during wedlock, using the word "declarations" to denote the statements either of a living or of a dead spouse, and that the intention was to carve out of this rule a limited exception that, with the sanction of the solemnity of sworn testimony given voluntarily and subject to the scrutiny of cross-examination, a living spouse might elect to give evidence of non-intercourse. B While I appreciate the force of the view that I have defined, I have come to the conclusion that the better view is that there was no wider rule of law in contemplation than that which previously rendered inadmissible the evidence that the enactment expressly makes admissible. C

As to the two contentions which I have summarised above, the first is largely met when it is remembered that, though in a divorce suit neither spouse can be asked any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery D unless he or she has already given evidence in the same proceedings in disproof of the alleged adultery, yet evidence can be given of some confession made. Applying the reasoning of LORD SELBORNE quoted above from the speech in The Aylesford Peerage (2), the position is reached that the statement of the intestate is admissible for the reason that the intestate, if living, would have been a competent witness to give evidence herself of what she stated. The same reasoning is E relevant when considering the second of the two contentions. If the intestate had been alive in 1951, she would have been permitted to give evidence to the effect of the statements attributed to her. If this second contention prevailed, then by a parity of reasoning there would have to be excluded from the operation of the Evidence Act, 1938, any statements recorded in writing before the passing of the Act.

F Since, for the reasons I have indicated, I have come to the conclusion that the evidence of the statements made by the intestate was admissible, it becomes imperative to decide what is the result that should follow. One possible course is that the matter should go back for further hearing. That would be most undesirable and is to be avoided unless inevitable. In my view, the matter can be decided without that necessity, and I propose to examine the position on the basis of the learned Vice-Chancellor's findings with the addition of Mr. Nugent's evidence as to the statements made by the intestate. The Vice-Chancellor G inclined to the view that the appellant's evidence as to what her mother (the intestate) had told her was not reliable evidence. For present purposes, that evidence must be disregarded. Mr. Nugent's evidence was accepted. He spoke not only in regard to what the intestate had said to him, but also to what Rooney H had said to him. In the nature of things, the statements of Rooney cannot be as informative as those of the intestate. Rooney could say that he believed he was the father of certain children. The intestate could say that she knew that her husband was not. We were not, however, invited to receive the evidence of Rooney's statements as evidence of their truth. As we were not so invited it is not necessary to consider the decision in Battle v. A.-G. (6).

Our attention was directed to some evidence given by Mrs. Barratt that the intestate said to her that she was married "to a man by the name of Jenion and that he lived with her mother in Stanhope Street in the south end". It was said that the intestate would be likely to visit her mother and might meet her husband and that intercourse might have taken place. It was submitted, accordingly, that proof of non-intercourse was not established. The suggestion implicit in this submission seems to be at least improbable. The Vice-Chancellor was satisfied on the evidence that he accepted that for many years before Sept. 20, 1926, there was no access to the body of the intestate by her husband, but he was left in doubt in regard to the date as from which such a state of affairs existed. In the case of the second plaintiff, born in October, 1911, he did not find acceptable evidence to rebut the presumption of legitimacy, but in the case of a daughter born in November, 1914, and in the cases of all later born children he did find such evidence. If, however, the evidence given by Mr. Nugent as to what the intestate said is admitted in proof of what was said, then, in my judgment, the position is very different. The statement of the intestate amounts to saying that in reference to the times when all the various children, other than the defendant and one who died quite young, were conceived, marital intercourse did not take place between her and her husband. When the statement was made, a child, by name Robina, who was older than the second plaintiff, was alive. In my judgment, the Vice-Chancellor would have come to a different conclusion in regard to the second plaintiff if he had felt able to admit the evidence of the statement of the intestate. With its reception the evidence was such as to rebut the presumption of legitimacy. I consider, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Joseph Norton, Liverpool (for the defendant); Pattinson & Brewer, agents for G. J. Lynskey & Sons, Liverpool (for the second plaintiff).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

LLOYDS BANK LTD. AND ANOTHER v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), March 18, 19, 20, April 8, 1952.]

Railway—Level crossing—Duty to provide gate-keeper and lodge—Crossing originally accommodation crossing—Road taken over by local authority—Construction of additional line under private Act—Common law duty to take care—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (c. 20), s. 47—Railways Clauses Act, 1863 (c. 92), s. 6.

By s. 47 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 "If [a] railway cross any . . . public carriage road on a level, the [railway] company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates across such road, on each side of the railway . . . and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates." By the Great Northern Railway Act, 1846, which incorporated the Act of 1845, the defendants' predecessors obtained powers to construct two railway lines and to carry them on the level across, inter alia, an accommodation road at C. By s. 6 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, it is provided that railway companies shall erect and maintain a lodge at the point where the railway crosses on the level a public carriage road. Before 1898 the road on either side of the company's lines became a public carriage road owned by the local authority. By the Great Northern Railway Act, 1898, the company were granted powers to widen portions of their existing railways and to lay down additional lines, and by s. 6, subject to the provisions of the Acts of 1845 and 1863, "the company may in the construction of the railway carry the same across and on the level of the public road . . . at [C.].” In or about 1902 a third line at C. was constructed under the powers conferred by the Act of 1898. On Oct. 16, 1948, M. was killed in a collision between his car and a train at the level crossing at C. The defendants had erected gates at the crossing, but no person was employed to open and shut them, no lodge had been erected and no steps had been taken to warn the public of the approach of trains. On a claim by M.’s executors for damages for breach of statutory duty and at common law, HELD: although the section of the road occupied by the railway crossing had never become a public carriage road, in 1902 the company had taken advantage of the powers granted them by the Act of 1898 to lay the additional line, and the effect of s. 6 of that Act was that the company were thereafter bound to treat the crossing as a public level crossing subject to the obligations placed on the company by the Acts of 1845 and 1863, and, therefore, the defendants, in failing to provide a gate-keeper and a lodge, were in breach of their statutory duty.

Quaere, whether the laying of the additional line was an act necessary for making, maintaining, altering, repairing or using the railway within s. 16 of the Act of 1845.

Per DENNING and ROMER, L.JJ.: Apart from statute the defendants were under a duty at common law to prevent danger at these crossings. As the danger increases, so must their precautions increase. The defendants cannot stand by while accidents happen and say: “This increased traffic on the road is no concern of ours”. It is their concern. It is their trains which help to cause the accidents, and it is often the increased number of trains which increases the danger as well as the increased traffic on the road. The defendants must, therefore, do whatever is reasonable on their part to prevent the accidents. They need not at common law go so far as to turn the crossing into a public level crossing with all the statutory obligations incident thereto, but they must do all that may be reasonably required of them, in the shape of warnings, whistles, and so forth so as to reduce the danger to people using the crossing.

AS TO LEVEL CROSSINGS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 27, pp. 86-89, paras. 172-176; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 38, pp. 307-318, Nos. 322-366.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Great Central Ry. Co. v. Balby-with-Hexthorpe Urban Council, A.-G. v. Great Central Ry. Co., [1912] 2 Ch. 110; 81 L.J.Ch. 596; 106 L.T. 413; 76 J.P. 205; 26 Digest 292, 240.
- (2) Stirling Western District Committee of the County Council v. North British Ry. Co., (1896), 23 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 929; 33 Sc. L.R. 459; 3 S.L.T. 323; 38 Digest 263, f.
- (3) A.-G. v. Great Northern Ry. Co., [1916] 2 A.C. 356; 85 L.J.Ch. 717; 115 L.T. 235; 80 J.P. 337; 26 Digest 582, 2719.
- (4) Copps v. Payne, [1950] 1 All E.R. 246; [1950] 1 K.B. 611; 114 J.P. 118; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Cliff v. Midland Ry. Co., (1870), L.R. 5 Q.B. 258; 22 L.T. 382; 34 J.P. 357; 38 Digest 313, 347.
- (6) Smith v. London, Midland & Scottish Ry. Co., 1948 S.L.T. 238; 1948 S.C. 125; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of LLOYD-JACOB, J., sitting as an additional judge of the King’s Bench Division, dated Dec. 19, 1951, in an action for damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

The plaintiffs, Lloyds Bank Ltd., and Margaret Outram Mellows, his widow, were executors of Arthur Holdich Mellows, deceased. The defendants were the successors of the London North Eastern Railway Co., formerly called the Great Northern Railway Co. and were sued pursuant to s. 5 (9) and s. 14 (3) and (4) of the Transport Act, 1947.

On Oct. 16, 1948, the deceased was killed by a railway train while driving his motor car across a railway owned by the defendants at Connington near Peterborough. At the date of the accident there were gates at the crossing which had to be operated by those using it, and a friend who was travelling with the deceased got out of the car to open the gates. The visibility was bad, but the deceased, without waiting for his friend to signal him on, started to cross the level crossing when a train came into collision with the car. There had been previous accidents at this crossing with loss of life, but there was no system to ensure that a warning whistle was sounded by an engine approaching the crossing.

At the place in question the railway had been constructed in exercise of powers conferred on the defendants' predecessors under the Great Northern Railway Act, 1846, whereby they were authorised to carry a double line across, inter alia, what was described as an occupation road at Connington. A piece of the road, within the limits of which the lines were laid, was conveyed to the railway company in 1853, the company undertaking to preserve the crossing in a form suitable for the passage of wagons. At some time prior to 1891 the road on each side of the railway company's strip of land was taken over by the local authority as a public highway. By the Great Northern Railway Acts, 1891 and 1898, the company were authorised, subject to the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, to widen their existing railway and to lay down additional lines at various places including the strip at Connington, and in or about 1902 an additional line was laid. The plaintiffs claimed that, at the date of the accident, the road at Connington was a public road crossed on the level by the railway, and, therefore, was in law deemed to be a public level crossing so that the defendants were subject to the obligations placed on them by the Acts of 1845 and 1863—in particular the obligation to employ a person to open and shut the gates and to maintain there a lodge. Further, or alternatively, the plaintiffs claimed that the defendants were guilty of negligence. The defendants denied that the crossing was a public level crossing, or that they owed to the deceased any statutory duty, or that they were negligent. LLOYD-JACOB, J., held that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty and were guilty of negligence at common law, but he also held that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence and that, therefore, the defendants were liable for only three quarters of the damage suffered.

MacKenna, Q.C., and Denny for the defendants.

Gardiner, Q.C., and Winn for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 8. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The first question is whether the piece of land bought by the company in 1853 as a section of an accommodation road has become a public carriage road irrespective of anything in the Great Northern Railway Acts of 1891 or 1898. I think the answer to this is clearly "No". The plaintiffs at one time alleged that the defendants' predecessors had dedicated this piece of land as a public highway. This allegation was withdrawn. There is no record or evidence as to any negotiations or agreement with the company at the time when the road east and west of the company's land was taken over as a public highway. There are, as the cases show, considerable limitations on the powers of a railway company expressly or impliedly to dedicate land as a highway: Great Central Ry. Co. v. Balby-with-Hexthorpe Urban Council (1). I think the proper inference is that this portion of the road did not become a public carriage way, leaving over any argument based on the words of the Acts, but that the company acquiesced in its user by members of the public, who would, of course, be entitled to use the public highway up to their gates on the east and west of their property and would want to cross the line.

The next submission on behalf of the defendants is that the third line was constructed under the powers of the Act of 1846 as read with s. 16 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Under s. 28 of the former Act the undertaking had to be completed within seven years, and the powers then ceased. It was not disputed that a double track line had been completed within that period on the section with which we are concerned. The relevant powers of the railway company after that period are to be found in s. 16 of the Act of 1845 which relates to the execution of the following works, viz., inclined planes, etc., alteration of course of rivers, drains, warehouses. We are concerned with the last two headings which I will set out.

“Alteration and repairs.—[The company] may from time to time alter, repair, or discontinue the before-mentioned works or any of them, and substitute others in their stead; and, General Power—they may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering, or repairing, and using the railway.”

There is very little authority on the scope of these words. In Stirling Western District Committee of the County Council v. North British Ry. Co. (2) similar words in the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, were construed and applied. The company were required by the Board of Trade to interlock signals and in connection therewith construct a loop line at a station, which had to cross a public level crossing adjacent to the station. It was held by the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK (LORD MACDONALD), LORD YOUNG concurring, that this was an act “necessary for using the railway”, and, therefore, within the company’s powers. LORD TRAYNER also agreed with this, but, in addition, relied on a different ground. Under their original powers, which had expired, the company were entitled to construct a double line. On this part of their undertaking they had only laid a single line. LORD TRAYNER thought that in these circumstances the laying of a double line would be a “substitution” within the words I have cited.

The question has to be considered in the light of the Acts of 1891 and 1898 under which power was sought and obtained, inter alia, to widen certain portions of the railway including that in question here. Was this third track a widening under the latter of these Acts, as the learned judge held, or something authorised under s. 16 of the Act of 1845 in relation to the old undertaking? Owing to the destruction of records there is no satisfactory evidence on this point. No further land was purchased. There are no written records as to its construction. We were told that, in addition to the plans which we have, specifications are deposited by the promoters with Bills of this kind. These might have been conclusive. There was evidence that the line was at one time called an engineers’ siding and later a down goods line. I do not propose to refer to such evidence as there was in detail. I think the judge was entitled to draw the inference that it was a “widening” under the powers conferred by the Act of 1898 and not an act necessary for making, maintaining, altering or using the railway as constructed under the Act of 1845. The question what is covered by s. 16 of the Act of 1845 is obviously a very important one. If any principles are to be laid down, it is desirable this should be done when full facts are available as to the circumstances and purpose of the construction. The decision on this point should not be regarded as a precedent. The court has to do its best in the absence of material.

This brings me to the next question which turns on s. 6 of the Great Northern Railway Act, 1898, which reads as follows:

“Subject to the provisions in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and in Part I (relating to the construction of a railway) of the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, contained in reference to the crossing of roads on the level the company may in the construction of the railway carry the same across and on the level of the public roads next hereinafter mentioned (that is to say):— . . . No. on Deposited Plan. 20. Parish. Connington . . . Provided that with respect to the following roads the company shall construct and maintain at each of the said level crossings a footbridge if and when so required by the road authority having jurisdiction over the road so crossed but when such footbridge shall have been completed to the satisfaction of such road authority all public rights of way for foot passengers over such level crossing shall be extinguished:— . . . No. on Deposited Plan. 20. Parish. Connington . . . ”

In the list of roads with the plan, No. 20 is referred to as a public road, be it noted in the singular, and the owner as Huntingdon Rural District Council. The plan shows the further strips of land which the company were authorised to purchase.

The first argument for the plaintiffs is that the words cited converted the section on the railway company's old land into a public highway. I doubt this. On the other hand, the section clearly contemplates the crossing of a public road, and, admittedly, on the new strips of land, which it was contemplated the railway would or might purchase, the road was a public road. The defendants admit that, if the widening had taken place on this new land, a public road would have been crossed with the consequence that the provisions of s. 47 of the Act of 1845 would have been applicable. If, however, the crossing is on the railway company's old land, there is, it is submitted, no crossing of a public highway and neither s. 47 nor the proviso to s. 6 of the Act of 1898 are operative. Such a result could not have been contemplated. With regard to the proviso, counsel for the defendants suggested that, if the new line was built on the new land, the footbridge, if required, would have to go over the old lines as well. On his argument I cannot see that this is right, but the idea of a footbridge over one of three lines is, of course, absurd.

I think the effect of the words of s. 6 of the Act of 1898 is to make the crossing of this road on the level, if done under the powers of the Act, the crossing of a public road for statutory purposes, whether on the new land or the old. If it had been intended to preserve, quoad this road, the right to treat it as an “accommodation” crossing if done on the old land, it would have been necessary to make express provision. On this basis the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, found the deceased guilty of contributory negligence and the defendants guilty of negligence at common law in not providing a whistle board, and continued:] With regard to the apportionment, this is a matter on which this court rarely interferes. I see no reason for doing so here. At the time of the previous accidents at the latest, it should have been realised that this was, from the point of view of danger, a public highway crossing with a substantial amount of traffic. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: When the railways were built over one hundred years ago, Parliament required the proprietors to make proper provision for the places where the railway crossed public highways and private occupation roads. In some cases it required the proprietors to make bridges to carry the roads over the railway. In other cases it allowed the proprietors to make level crossings. And Parliament said that, whatever the proprietors made, they had to maintain. But Parliament did not require the proprietors to make any provision for any increases in traffic along the highways or occupation roads. This was a pardonable oversight. As LORD SUMNER said in A.-G. v. Great Northern Ry. Co. (3) ([1916] 2 A.C. 380):

“If the legislature in 1845 did not see ahead beyond the end of the century, it, at any rate, exercised a degree of foresight that has not always been equalled in public affairs.”

The result is that in the course of the last hundred years many bridges which used to carry light country traffic now have to carry a great quantity of heavy goods traffic, but the railway company are under no statutory obligation to increase the strength of the bridges. Likewise, many level crossings which were made to permit a few carts to pass along an occupation road now have to submit to the burden of the traffic of a new housing estate, but the railway company are under no statutory obligation to post a crossing-keeper or to provide any additional precautions. The occupation road may have since become a public highway, used by children on their way to school, but still the defendants are under no statutory obligation to do anything more than their predecessors did one hundred years ago: Copps v. Payne (4). Theoretically the defendants might object to this increase in traffic, and might refuse to allow anyone to cross except the owners and occupiers of the lands on either side, but that is not a practical proposition. They cannot in practice separate those with a right to cross from those without. So the increased traffic goes unchecked and with it increased danger, but no increased precautions are required by statute, at any rate when the governing statute is the Act of 1845, as it usually is.

If the statute has stood still, however, the common law has not. It is, I think, now clearly established that the defendants must take reasonable care to prevent danger at these crossings, and this is an obligation which keeps pace with the times. As the danger increases, so must their precautions increase. The defendants cannot stand by while accidents happen and say: "This increased traffic on the road is no concern of ours". It is their concern. It is their trains which help to cause the accidents, and it is often the increased number of trains which increases the danger as well as the increased traffic on the road. The defendants must, therefore, do whatever is reasonable on their part to prevent the accidents. They need not at common law go so far as to turn the crossing into a public level crossing with all the statutory obligations incident thereto, but they must do all that may be reasonably required of them, in the shape of warnings, whistles, and so forth so as to reduce the danger to people using the crossing. This is, I think, clearly shown by Cliff v. Midland Ry. Co. (5) (L.R. 5 Q.B. 266); and Smith v. London, Midland & Scottish Ry. Co. (6). In the present case the judge has found that the defendants did not use reasonable care at this crossing, and I agree with him. The history of accidents was such as to demand extra precautions of them, and they took none. They should have taken steps by whistling or otherwise to warn road traffic of the approach of trains.

Even if this view is wrong, however, I think that in this particular case the statutory obligations on the company have not stood still. They depend, not on the Act of 1845, but on the Great Northern Railway Act, 1898. Although this road was an occupation road one hundred years ago when the railway was built, nevertheless, it had become a public road fifty years later when the railway was widened, and this makes a lot of difference. The important question we have to decide is what is the effect of the Act of 1898 on the position of this crossing?

When the railway was built, there were only two tracks along this section of it, an up track and a down track. Nothing was said in the Great Northern Railway Act, 1846, about the number of tracks the proprietors might build, but I think Parliament can only have contemplated two tracks. It was, I think, only on that basis that the proprietors were allowed to cross a large number of roads, both public and private, on the level. It is obvious that, if additional lines of railway were allowed so as to make three or four tracks along this section, there would be additional inconvenience, not to say danger, to persons using the roads. If three or four tracks had been contemplated in 1846, Parliament might well have insisted on bridges over the public roads, and the justices might have insisted on special precautions for the private roads. In these circumstances I do not think that the company had any right to lay more than two tracks at the level crossings without going to Parliament for permission to do so. The company seem themselves to have taken that view, because in 1891 and 1898 when they contemplated widening "the main line on both sides" along this section, they went to Parliament for permission, and they only got permission on the terms of taking additional precaution at some of the level crossings: see, for instance, the provision about Holme Station crossing in s. 10 of the Act of 1891 where it is stipulated that the company should not lay more than one additional line of rails unless the siding crossing the road on the level was removed, and the provision as to footbridges in the Act of 1891, s. 10, and the Act of 1898, s. 6. A

Counsel for the defendants argued strongly that the company only needed permission to acquire extra land. They did not need permission, he said, to lay extra tracks on their existing land. I do not agree with this contention, at any rate, not so far as level crossings are concerned. I think it plain that the permission given in 1846 for level crossings was given on a two-track basis and did not apply to three or four tracks. The company realised this, because by s. 5 of the Acts of 1891 and 1898 they sought permission to widen "portions" of their existing railways "including . . . the laying down of additional lines of rails upon the said portions." That was one of the objects of the Acts which, it was recited, could "not be attained without the authority of Parliament." In 1891 and 1898 Parliament gave the company the permission sought. They permitted the company to lay the lines on certain conditions. What were the conditions so far as the Connington level crossing was concerned? This is the crux of the case. B C

It is quite plain that by 1898 the road on each side of the railway had ceased to be an occupation road and had become a public road. It was so described by Parliament. The short stretch belonging to the railway had not, however, become a public road. The railway company had not dedicated it to the public and had no power to dedicate it. Nevertheless, the road on either side was public. That meant that the crossing had become for all practical purposes a public level crossing. This was, I think, recognised by Parliament. The crossing was treated in the Act as a public level crossing. It was included among a number of public level crossings where the company were required to comply with the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Railways Clauses Act, 1863, about public level crossings, and were required also to erect footbridges if the road authority required them to do so. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that, if the company availed themselves of the permission given by Parliament, they were bound to treat the Connington level crossing as a public level crossing. The company did, I think, avail themselves of the permission given by the Act of 1898. They laid an additional track at Connington level crossing, thus making the crossing into a three-track crossing instead of a two-track one. Counsel for the defendants argued that the company did not avail themselves of the statutory permission, because the line was only a siding and not an additional track. I do not think that is a correct view of the facts, but it does not matter. It was, in any case, an additional line of rails within s. 5 of the Act which required the permission of the Act, and subjects the company to the obligations of the Act. I readily agree that a railway company does not need to go to Parliament afresh for permission for every additional siding it makes. It does not need permission for any works on its own land which come within the wide powers given by s. 16 of the Act of 1845 and do not impinge on the rights of others. But when an additional siding or line of rails is made at a level crossing—and creates an additional danger for the users of it, over and above the danger authorised by the original Act—then it does impinge on the rights of others and permission must be obtained for it. In my opinion, therefore, from and after the laying of this additional line of rails, the company ought to have treated the Connington crossing as a public level crossing subject to all the obligations of the Acts of 1845 and 1863. In particular, they ought to have provided a crossing-keeper. Their failure to do so was, undoubtedly, one of the causes of the accidents at this spot. D E F G H

Colonel Mellows was guilty of contributory negligence. The judge has reduced the damages by one quarter on that account and we cannot interfere with his assessment. I think the judgment of the learned judge was right on both grounds and the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: Apart altogether from the question whether the strip of land at Connington over which the railway runs has, in fact, become a part of the highway which it divides, it is quite evident that for many years past the defendants and their predecessors have been content to permit the public to regard it, and to use it, as such. Whether or not it would have been possible for the railway authorities to have confined its user to those for whose benefit the original accommodation road was made, they did not do so, and the result is that, as stated by the learned judge, some seventy-five to one hundred vehicles cross the strip in each twenty-four hour period. Accordingly, it seems to me that it is not open to the company to wash its hands of the matter and to adopt the attitude that, if members of the general public choose to use the crossing, they have no business to do so and must take the consequences. A position of great potential danger has arisen to the public from the acquiescence of the company in this user, and I cannot think that it is under no duty at common law to take such steps as are reasonably open to it to avert, or at least diminish, such danger.

The amount of traffic which uses the crossing is not only a material factor to be borne in mind when considering whether such a duty exists, but it is relevant to the degree of care which the duty, if established, involves: per LUSH, J., in Cliff v. Midland Ry. Co. (5) (L.R. 5 Q.B. 266). The element of substantial user which has been established in the present case does not, however, stand alone. In addition to it is the admitted fact that many accidents have taken place at this crossing in the last few years, in one of which several people lost their lives. In these circumstances I am satisfied that the defendants were negligent in failing to take any precautions against further disasters. The most obvious precaution was to set up a whistle board at the side of the line. The engine driver who was driving the train when the accident to Col. Mellows occurred did not use his whistle, but I gather from his evidence that he would have done so if he had been instructed to do so by a board. Had he done so, it is highly probable that no accident would have occurred. The failure of the defendants to order him to do so at this particular crossing amounted, in my opinion, to a dereliction of the duty which they owed to the public. The learned judge held that the deceased himself was not free from blame and in this I agree with him and with the reasons which he gave for arriving at this conclusion. He assessed the responsibility of the deceased for the accident at one quarter, and I see no sufficient reason for criticising this apportionment.

As to the other matters that were argued before us, I agree with my Lord in thinking that it would be better not to define the scope of s. 16 of the Act of 1845 in relation to this case, for the historical details of the matter are too obscure. But, in my opinion, the learned judge was well justified in the view which he took that the additional line which was laid across the strip early in the present century constituted a widening of the line as it then existed and was carried out under the powers conferred by the Act of 1898. The Act contained a recital—not the less significant because it is a usual feature of statutes of this description—that “the objects of this Act cannot be attained without the authority of Parliament.” Section 6 empowered the company in the construction of the railway to carry the same across, inter alia, the “public road” at Connington, which is the road that the company’s line bisects. The construction of the railway mentioned in s. 6 is a reference to the works authorised by s. 5 and on the proper interpretation of s. 5 it seems to me that “the additional lines of rails” thereby authorised were not confined to lines laid on extra land that the company might thereafter acquire but included also the laying of additional lines on land which the company already owned, and which would constitute a “widening” of the railway. The Act, therefore, authorised the company to do something that it could not have otherwise done, namely, to widen its railway by laying an additional line across the strip at Connington. This the company proceeded to do shortly after the Act was passed, and in these circumstances a strong inference arises that the operation was effected under the powers of the Act and under those powers alone. On this footing it is, I think, immaterial that the company cannot be presumed to have dedicated the strip as part of the public highway prior to the Act of 1898 (for such a dedication would have interfered with the due performance of its statutory duties), nor is it material that the Act did not itself expressly (nor, I think, impliedly) make the strip a part of the highway which it crosses. What is material is that s. 6 of the Act provided in effect that, if the company exercised its power under that section to lay an additional line over this crossing, it could only do so on terms that the crossing was elevated to the status of a highway for the purposes of the Acts of 1845 and 1863. The company could not take advantage of the power while disregarding the corresponding obligation, and I, accordingly, agree with the learned judge that in making the extra line they became automatically bound to provide the whole crossing with the safeguards appropriate to a public level crossing, and in failing to make this provision they were in breach of their statutory obligation and are liable in damages accordingly. I, therefore, think that the learned judge was right in his conclusions both as to the liability of the defendants at common law and as to their statutory liability, and I, accordingly, agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: M. H. B. Gilmour (for the defendants); J. D. Langton & Passmore (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

PAGET PUBLICATIONS, LTD. v. WATSON.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Byrne, JJ.), April 24, 1952.]

Criminal Law—Obscene publication—Cover of publication obscene—Destruction of whole publication—Obscene Publications Act, 1857 (c. 83), s. 1.

On a summons to show cause why copies of a publication seized under a warrant issued under the Obscene Publications Act, 1857, s. 1, should not be destroyed, the magistrate found that illustrations on the insides of the covers of the publication were the only obscene parts of the publication. The publishers submitted that in those circumstances there was no power to order the destruction of the whole publication. The magistrate overruled that submission and ordered the destruction of the whole publication.

HELD: a publication was an obscene publication even if only a part of it was obscene, and, therefore, the order to destroy the whole publication was right.

AS TO INDECENT PUBLICATIONS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 395, 396, paras. 667-669; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 15, pp. 748-751, Nos. 8068-8095, and Digest Supps.

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at the West London Magistrate's Court, on the complaint of the respondent, a warrant was issued under the Obscene Publications Act, 1857, s. 1, and thirteen thousand copies of a book called "Slick Bedtime Stories" were brought before the court whereupon a summons was issued to the appellants, as publishers of the book, to show cause why the said books should not be destroyed. For the respondent it was contended that the publication was obscene and an order for its destruction should be made, and that the court had no power to order the destruction of only the covers of the publication, but that the entire books must be destroyed. It was contended for the appellants that the publication was not obscene, and that, if the court found that the illustrations which formed part of the covers were obscene, but not the remainder of the publication, an order should be made for the destruction of the covers alone. The appellants offered to give an undertaking to remove the covers of the books and destroy them before the books were removed from the custody of the court. The magistrate was of the opinion that the illustrations inside the covers of the publication were obscene, that the outside of the covers and the contents of the books were not obscene, that the books constituted articles which were not capable in law of being divided into separate components, that, unless he followed the "all or nothing" principle, he would be acting as a censor, that censorship of parts or passages of publications was not a function of the court under the Act of 1857, and that the appellants had not shown cause in law why an order should not be made for the destruction of the whole books, and, he, therefore, made an order for their destruction.

Hanlon for the appellants.

M. J. H. Turner for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: A warrant was issued under the Obscene Publications Act, 1857, authorising the police to seize certain books, namely, thirteen thousand copies of a publication called "Slick Bedtime Stories" and to have the publishers brought before the magistrate to show cause why the books should not be destroyed. The magistrate held that the illustrations inside both the back and the front of the cover were obscene. It is not for this court to consider whether he was right or wrong in that respect. If we had to consider it, we should say that undoubtedly, he was right. The magistrate has also held that the contents of the books were not obscene. If it was for this court to decide whether he was right or wrong about that, this court would have said he was wrong. We have seen sufficient of the contents to appreciate that the contents are grossly obscene in places, but we are only dealing with the cover.

It is suggested that the magistrate had no power to order the destruction of the whole of each book, and that he ought to have ordered the destruction of only the cover. The question raised by the Case Stated is whether the magistrate had power to make the order which he did make. In the opinion of the court, this point is unarguable. It is not necessary to show that a publication is obscene on every page. A publication may be obscene because part of it is obscene. Very few publications can be said to be obscene on every page, but this is an obscene publication, and, in those circumstances it is to be destroyed. It was not for the magistrate to go through the book page by page. In my opinion, his order was perfectly right, and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

OLIVER, J.: I agree. There was abundant evidence on which the magistrate could find that this was an obscene publication, and, therefore, it should be destroyed.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Brandon & Nicholson (for the appellants); Director of Public Prosecutions (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Applied. WOOLLEY v. MOORE.
[1952] 2 All E.R. 797.

BLENKIN v. BELL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Byrne, JJ.), April 24, 1952.]

Street Traffic—Excessive speed—Shooting-brake with "C" licence—Use solely for carrying passengers—Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933 (c. 53), s. 9 (2).

A shooting-brake or utility van, in respect of which a private carrier's "C" licence was held, while carrying passengers and not goods, was driven on a non-restricted road at a speed in excess of thirty miles an hour. On a charge against the driver of driving the vehicle at a speed greater than the speed specified in sched. I to the Road Traffic Act, 1934, as the maximum speed for a vehicle of that class or description, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 10, as amended by the Road Traffic Act, 1934, s. 2,

HELD: in view of the provisions of s. 9 (2) of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, where a vehicle, which could be used for carrying either passengers or goods, was not carrying goods the conditions of the private carrier's licence held in respect of it did not apply, and, therefore, the vehicle in question was not subject to the speed restrictions applicable to the use of the vehicle under the "C" licence.

Hubbard v. Messenger ([1937] 4 All E.R. 48), distinguished.

AS TO EXCEEDING SPEED LIMITS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, pp. 666, 667, paras. 974, 975, and FOR CASES see DIGEST Supps.

Case referred to:

(1) Hubbard v. Messenger, [1937] 4 All E.R. 48; [1938] 1 K.B. 300; 107 L.J.K.B. 44; 157 L.T. 512; 101 J.P. 533; Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Durham justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Durham on Oct. 3, 1951, an information was preferred by the appellant, a superintendent of police, charging that the respondent unlawfully drove a motor vehicle at a speed greater than thirty miles an hour, the speed specified in sched. I to the Road Traffic Act, 1934, as the maximum speed in relation to a vehicle of that class or description, contrary to s. 10 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, as amended by s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1934. It was proved or admitted that at the material time the respondent was driving at a speed of over thirty miles an hour. He held a "C" private carrier's licence in respect of the vehicle which was a shooting brake or utility van. It was equipped with pneumatic tyres and weighed less than three tons. Sometimes it was used for carrying goods, but at the time of the alleged offence it was being used solely for the carriage of passengers. The vehicle had in addition to the front doors a rear door on either side and a door at the back, and contained a seat for one passenger beside the driver and two rear seats for passengers. The rear seats were fixed to the floor by screws and bolts.

It was contended for the appellant that the vehicle was a goods vehicle licensed under a "C" licence and subject to the speed limit of thirty miles per hour, and that the Motor Vehicles (Variation of Speed Limit) Regulations, 1950, did not except the vehicle from that speed limit. It was contended for the respondent that at the material time the vehicle was not a goods vehicle, but a passenger vehicle, and that it was not subject to the speed limit merely by virtue of the "C" licence. The justices were of the opinion that at the material time the vehicle was not being used under the authority of the licence, but as a private car carrying passengers, and was, therefore, not subject to the thirty miles speed limit. The information was dismissed and the appellant appealed.

D. H. Robson for the appellant.

Skelhorn for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Durham before whom the respondent was charged with unlawfully driving a motor vehicle at a speed greater than thirty miles an hour, the speed specified in sched. I to the Road Traffic Act, 1934, as the maximum speed in relation to a vehicle of that class or description, contrary to s. 10 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The point for decision is whether or not the vehicle in question was to be regarded as a goods vehicle. The vehicle, as found by the justices, was a shooting brake or utility van, a class of vehicle considered by the court in Hubbard v. Messenger (1). Although counsel for the respondent has said that, in view of the make and construction of the vehicle, the present case should be distinguished from Hubbard v. Messenger (1), the court is giving its decision on the footing that this utility truck was of the same class and description as the vehicle in Hubbard v. Messenger (1). We are doing that without prejudice to the contention that the cases can be distinguished—in other words, we are going to decide this case on the ground that the vehicle could be described, at any rate when it was carrying goods, as a goods vehicle and not as a passenger vehicle, which means a vehicle constructed solely for the carriage of passengers and their effects.

The Road Traffic Act, 1930, removed a speed limit for a passenger vehicle, provided it was a passenger vehicle adapted to carry not more than seven passengers and was not a heavy motor car or invalid carriage. Schedule I, which dealt with limits of speed, provided by para. 2:

“Goods vehicles, that is to say vehicles constructed or adapted for use for the conveyance of goods or burden of any description:—(1) When not drawing a trailer—(a) Motor cars, if all the wheels are fitted with pneumatic tyres; and (b) Heavy motor cars, constructed or adapted for the conveyance of horses and their attendants and used solely for that purpose, if all the wheels are fitted with pneumatic tyres—thirty miles per hour.”

The Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, s. 1, set up a system of licensing for goods vehicles, and there were various forms of licences known as public carriers' licences, limited carriers' licences, and private carriers' licences, one or the other of which had to be taken out to enable a goods vehicle to operate on the road. A private carrier's licence is referred to in the Act as a “C” licence.

The vehicle with which we are now dealing had a “C” licence. Section 8 (1) of the Act of 1933 provides:

“It shall be a condition of every licence . . . (b) that any provisions (whether contained in any statute or in any statutory rules or orders) with respect to limits of speed and weight, laden and unladen, and the loading of goods vehicles, are complied with in relation to the authorised vehicles.”

Observe the use of the words “authorised vehicles” there. Under s. 8 (1) it is perfectly clear that every licence which is granted to a goods vehicle under the provisions of the Act—including a “C” licence—contains, or must be deemed to contain, a provision that the vehicle must not be driven on the roads at more than thirty miles an hour. By s. 9:

“(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, any person who fails to comply with any condition of a licence held by him, shall be guilty of an offence under this Part of this Act. (2) Notwithstanding that a vehicle is an authorised vehicle, the conditions of the licence shall not apply while the vehicle is being used for any purpose for which it might lawfully be used without the authority of a licence.”

The effect of that sub-section seems to be perfectly clear. A vehicle with a “C” licence must be deemed to have a condition attached to it that it shall only be driven at thirty miles an hour, but, if it is not being used as a goods vehicle, the condition shall not apply while it is being used for any purpose for which it might lawfully be used without the authority of a licence—in other words, if it is being used as a passenger-carrying vehicle and not as a goods vehicle no licence is required and so the conditions of the licence will not apply. In the Road Traffic Act, 1934, sched. I, para. 2, goods vehicles are defined in this way:

" . . . vehicles constructed or adapted for use for the conveyance of goods or burden of any description."

and it is provided that such goods vehicles must not be driven at more than thirty miles an hour.

No doubt owing to the fact that there had been many prosecutions and a certain amount of dissatisfaction with regard to the use of shooting brakes, the Minister made the Motor Vehicles (Variation of Speed Limit) Regulations, 1950, the effect of which was to substitute amended provisions for those in para. 2 of sched. I to the Act of 1934, and as a result the Act of 1934 must be read as prescribing a speed of thirty miles an hour for goods vehicles

" . . . which are authorised to be used under a licence granted under Part I of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933 . . . "

In my opinion, the answer to this case is to be found in s. 9 (2) of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, which provides that, if the vehicle is not being used for the purpose of carrying goods or burden, it is not to be limited in the way that s. 8 would limit it. I can find no indication that the Road Traffic Act, 1934, is intended to repeal s. 8 or s. 9 of the Act of 1933, and it seems to me that the construction I have mentioned is consonant with reason and common sense. If a vehicle can be used for carrying either passengers or goods, and it is being used for carrying goods, as distinct from passengers' luggage, it requires a licence and certain restrictions are placed on its use on the road. If it were not used as a goods vehicle, it would not require a licence, and the speed limit is only applicable when it is carrying goods. In Hubbard v. Messenger (1) the point did not arise because there the vehicle was carrying goods and was restricted to thirty miles an hour. In my opinion, the justices came to a right decision.

OLIVER, J.: I agree.

BYRNE, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Theodore Goddard & Co. and Deacons & Pritchards, agents for Swinburne & Jackson, Durham (for the appellant); A. J. A. Hanhart, agents for Hadaway & Hadaway, Newcastle-upon-Tyne (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

SULTAN OF JOHORE v. ABUBAKAR, TUNKU ARIS BENDAHARA AND OTHERS.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Viscount Simon, Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord Radcliffe and Sir Alfred Bucknill), January 14, 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 24, April 22, 1952.].

A Conflict of Laws—Impleading independent sovereign—Immunity from legal process—Waiver—Submission to jurisdiction by institution of proceedings—Continuation of proceedings by way of appeal—Japanese Judgments and Civil Proceedings Ordinance, 1946 (Singapore Ordinance No. 37 of 1946), s. 3.

Before the occupation of Singapore by the Japanese in February, 1942, the Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements had jurisdiction to decide the title to immovable property in Singapore. In May, 1942, the Japanese military administration set up, in place of the Supreme Court, a High Court called the Syonan Kotohoin, staffed with judges appointed by the Japanese administration and exercising a jurisdiction corresponding with that formerly exercised by the Supreme Court. The practice and procedure of the Japanese court was in all material respects identical with the practice and procedure of the former Supreme Court. By an originating summons, taken out on May 3, 1945, the Sultan of J. applied to the Japanese court to determine the validity of two deeds, executed by him on Dec. 1, 1903, and Dec. 22, 1926, respectively, which dealt with two plots of land in Singapore. These plots were originally the private property of the sultan, but, under the terms of the deeds (if they were valid) and in the events which had happened, A., the sultan's son, had a beneficial interest in them. On June 18, 1945, the Japanese court declared that the gifts contained in the two deeds were void and that the sultan was beneficially entitled to the properties with which they dealt. In September, 1945, the Japanese were driven out of Singapore, and on Apr. 1, 1946, a new and separate colony of Singapore was created by the Singapore Colony Order in Council, 1946, made under the Straits Settlements (Repeal) Act, 1946. By art. 44 of the order judicial proceedings which had been commenced in the former Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements before the Japanese occupation were linked with the newly created Supreme Court of the Colony of Singapore. To provide an opportunity for (inter alia) reviewing decrees made by a Japanese court in the appropriate court of the colony so as to enable an appeal to be brought against a Japanese decree or a decree which ought not to stand to be set aside, the Japanese Judgments and Civil Proceedings Ordinance, 1946, was enacted in Singapore. By s. 3 (1), any person aggrieved by a Japanese decree could apply to the appropriate court of the colony for an order that the decree be set aside or that the applicant be at liberty to appeal against it, and, by s. 3 (2), the court, on hearing the application, might, subject to the provisions of the section, make such order thereon as might seem just. On Apr. 14, 1947, A. took out an originating summons under the ordinance, claiming to be a person aggrieved by the Japanese decree of June 18, 1945, and applying for an order that it be set aside or that he be at liberty to appeal against it. At the material time, the sultan was recognised by His Majesty's government as an independent sovereign entitled to the immunities in respect of litigation which attached to that status. He entered a conditional appearance to the originating summons of Apr. 14, 1947, but applied to have it set aside and all further proceedings under it stayed on the ground that, as he was a sovereign ruler, the court had no jurisdiction over him.

HELD: the originating summons taken out by A. under s. 3 (1) of the ordinance was concerned with the matter raised by the sultan in the Japanese court, viz., the title to the properties dealt with in the deeds of Dec. 1, 1903, and Dec. 22, 1926; on its true construction, s. 3 of the ordinance authorised an application in the nature of an appeal from the Japanese decree, and the procedure authorised was essentially a carrying on of the proceeding already instituted and not a new and distinct proceeding, so that the steps taken by A., under s. 3, were in the nature of an appeal from the Japanese court to a court having jurisdiction to reverse the decision which the sultan had obtained and a continuation of the proceedings which the sultan had instituted; having invoked the jurisdiction of the Japanese court, the sultan could not object to being made a respondent in what was, in substance, an appeal in the proceedings, as his original submission to the original court bound him to accept the jurisdiction on appeal; and, therefore, he was disentitled to a stay of proceedings as he had waived his immunity.

Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government ([1924] A.C. 797), distinguished.

Per curiam: "Their Lordships do not consider that there has been finally established in England . . . any absolute rule that a foreign independent sovereign cannot be impleaded in our courts in any circumstances."

AS TO IMMUNITY OF FOREIGN SOVEREIGN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 1, p. 27, para. 30; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 1, p. 46, No. 368, and pp. 48, 49, Nos. 384-395.

Cases referred to:

- (1) The Charkieh, (1873), L. R. 4 A. & E. 59; 42 L.J. Adm. 17; 28 L.T. 513; 1 Digest 110, 142.
- (2) Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government, [1924] A.C. 797; 93 L.J. Ch. 343; 131 L.T. 676; Digest Supp.
- (3) The Parlement Belge, (1880), 5 P.D. 197; 42 L.T. 273; 1 Digest 110, 140.
- (4) Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S., [1938] 1 All E.R. 719; [1938] A.C. 485; 107 L.J.P. 1; 159 L.T. 394; Digest Supp.
- (5) Lariviere v. Morgan, (1872), 7 Ch. App. 550; reversd. on the facts, H.L. sub nom. Morgan v. Lariviere, (1875), L.R. 7 H.L. 423; 44 L.J.Ch. 457; 32 L.T. 41; 1 Digest 48, 390.
- (6) Brunswick (Duke) v. Hanover (King), (1844), 6 Beav. 1 (49 E.R. 724); 13 L.J.Ch. 107; affd. H.L., (1848), 2 H.L. Cas. 1 (9 E.R. 993); 1 Digest 50, 403.

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal of the Colony of Singapore (MURRAY-AYNSLEY, C.J., of Singapore, SIR H.C. WILLAN, C.J., of the Federation of Malaya, and EVANS, J.), dated Nov. 1, 1949, dismissing an appeal from an order of GORDON SMITH, J., dated Apr. 7, 1949, whereby he dismissed an application by the appellant, the Sultan of Johore, for an order that an originating summons taken out by the respondents should be set aside and all further proceedings under it stayed as the court had no jurisdiction over the appellant, he being a sovereign ruler.

By the originating summons, which was taken out in the High Court of the Colony of Singapore on Apr. 14, 1947, under art. 3 (1) of the Japanese Judgments and Civil Proceedings Ordinance, 1946, the respondents claimed that they were persons aggrieved by a decree of June 18, 1945, of a Japanese court in favour of the appellant, and applied for an order that the decree be set aside wholly or that they be at liberty to appeal against it. On the application by the appellant for the originating summons to be set aside and all further proceedings under it stayed, GORDON SMITH, J., held that the appellant had waived his immunity as a sovereign ruler by commencing the proceedings before the Japanese court (which had been set up in Singapore, in place of the former High Court, during the Japanese occupation), and that the proceedings which the appellant sought to stay were not new proceedings but a continuation of the earlier proceedings.

Harvey, Q.C., Megaw and E. Lauterpacht for the appellant.
MacKenna, Q.C., and I. C. Bailleau for the respondents.

April 22. VISCOUNT SIMON: This is an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal of the Colony of Singapore (MURRAY-AYNSLEY, C.J., of Singapore, SIR H. C. WILLAN, C.J., of the Federation of Malaya, and EVANS, J.) which arises in the following circumstances.

A The appellant became Sultan of Johore, by succession to his father, in 1895. By an indenture, dated Dec. 1, 1903, he purported to convey to his wife, in consideration of the natural love and affection which he bore to her, two plots of land belonging to him in Singapore with the dwelling-houses erected thereon. On Mar. 8, 1926, the lady died intestate, leaving surviving her the appellant and their only son, Tunku Abubakar (hereinafter called Abubakar), who is the first respondent. B Abubakar was granted letters of administration of his mother's estate. On her intestacy he was entitled to three-quarters of the estate and the appellant to one-quarter. An indenture, dated Dec. 22, 1926, between the appellant and Abubakar purported to convey these two properties to the appellant to hold on trust for the eldest daughter of Abubakar during her life, and after her death for any of her issue then living. On Mar. 1, 1939, this eldest daughter died intestate, an infant and unmarried, and Abubakar was, on Jan. 23, 1940, granted letters of administration of her estate. C By Mohammedan law, on the girl's death intestate, her father, Abubakar, would become entitled to five-sixths of the properties and her mother, Ungku Fatimah, would be entitled to one-sixth. By an indenture, dated June 28, 1944, between Abubakar, Ungku Fatimah and three individuals named as trustees, Abubakar and his wife assigned and transferred to the trustees certain properties and interests in properties in Singapore and in Johore, including the two properties above mentioned.

D In the course of the late war, the whole of Malaya (including Johore) and the colony of Singapore were invaded and for a time occupied by Japanese military forces. Singapore itself was thus occupied on Feb. 16, 1942, and this occupation continued until the Japanese were driven out in September, 1945. On effecting their occupation the Japanese authorities expelled the British administration from Singapore, the courts of that colony were closed and the British judges interned. E There had previously been a Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements, embracing Singapore, Penang and Malacca, which sat in Singapore. This was distinct from the Supreme Court of the Federated Malay States. The Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements had jurisdiction to decide the title to immovable property in Singapore. In May, 1942, the Japanese military administration set up, in place of the former Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements, a High Court called the "Syonan Kotohoin," staffed with judges appointed by the Japanese administration, which exercised a jurisdiction generally corresponding with that belonging to the former Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements. F The practice and procedure of the Syonan Kotohoin was, in all respects material to this appeal, identical with the practice and procedure of the former Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements.

G On May 3, 1945, the appellant took out an originating summons in the court of the judge at Syonan (Singapore), naming as defendant the Custodian of Enemy Property, Syonan. By this summons he applied to the Japanese court to determine the construction of the deeds of Dec. 1, 1903, and of Dec. 22, 1926, I have referred to, and to decide whether, having regard to the fact that the parties to these deeds were Mohammedans, the deeds were properly and lawfully executed under the law applicable to the parties and were valid. H The summons was heard by one Pillai, a Japanese-appointed judge of the Syonan Kotohoin. At the first hearing the defendant was represented, but on the adjournment for argument his representative was absent. Judgment in the appellant's favour was given by Pillai on June 18, 1945, and it was declared that Mohammedan law was applicable to the gifts contained in the two deeds and that the two gifts were void and of no effect, so that the properties with which they dealt reverted to the appellant as sole beneficial owner thereof.

When the Japanese were driven out in September, 1945, there followed a period during which authority was exercised by a British military administration, but on Apr. 1, 1946, a new and separate colony of Singapore was created by the Singapore Colony Order in Council, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 464), made under the Straits Settlements (Repeal) Act, 1946, and the British Settlements Acts, 1887 and 1945. By art. 14 of this Order in Council, the Supreme Court of the Colony of Singapore was established, and it is this court which has been functioning in the colony of Singapore since that date. Judicial proceedings which had been commenced before the Japanese occupation in the former Supreme Court of the Straits Settlements were linked with the newly created Supreme Court of the Colony of Singapore by art. 44 of the Order in Council, which provided:

"All proceedings other than proceedings in the Prize Court commenced before Feb. 15, 1942, in any court of justice in or having jurisdiction in, the territory comprised in the colony may be carried on in like manner as nearly as may be, as if this order and the Act of 1946 had not been made or passed but in the corresponding court of the colony, and any such proceeding may be amended in such manner as may appear necessary or proper in order to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the Act of 1946 and of this order."

It was considered necessary, as a consequence of the ending of Japanese occupation and the establishment of the Supreme Court of the Colony of Singapore to provide an opportunity (i) for carrying on before the appropriate court of the colony proceedings which had been commenced but not concluded before a Japanese court during the occupation, and (ii) for reviewing decrees made by a Japanese court in the appropriate court of the colony with a view to enabling an appeal to be brought against such decree or with a view to setting aside such decrees as ought not to stand. These objects were secured by the Japanese Judgments and Civil Proceedings Ordinance, 1946 (Singapore Ordinance No. 37 of 1946), the long title of which reads:

"An ordinance to make provision with regard to judgments, orders and decrees of Japanese courts and for the carrying on of proceedings instituted in such courts during the period of Japanese occupation."

Section 4 of this ordinance provides:

"(1) A party to any proceedings commenced before a Japanese court which were pending at the cessation of the Japanese occupation, may apply to the appropriate court, within three months from the commencement of this ordinance or such extended time as the appropriate court may allow, for leave to carry on such proceedings as proceedings of the appropriate court. (2) Upon the hearing of the application the appropriate court may order such proceedings to be carried on as though they had been instituted before the appropriate court and may order such amendments and give such consequential or other directions in the matter as may seem just."

Section 3 of the ordinance provides:

"(1) Any party to the proceedings in which a Japanese decree was made or given or any person aggrieved by such decree may, within three months from the commencement of this ordinance, or within such extended time as the appropriate court may allow, apply in the prescribed manner to the appropriate court for an order—(a) that such decree be set aside either wholly or in part; or (b) that the applicant be at liberty to appeal against such decree. (2) Upon the hearing of an application under the provisions of sub-s. (1) of this section the appropriate court may, subject to the provisions of this section, make such order or orders thereon as, in the circumstances of the case, may seem just. (3) No Japanese decree shall be set aside on the ground that the person or persons constituting the court whose decree is in question was or were not appointed in accordance with the provisions of, or did not possess the qualifications specified in, the existing laws.

(4) Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of sub-s. (2) of this section, a Japanese decree may be set aside on any of the grounds following—

(a) that it was obtained as a result of such force or threat of force, injury or detriment to any party to the proceedings or other person as in the opinion of the appropriate court was sufficient to render the action of the party in relation to the proceedings involuntary; (b) that any necessary party did not appear personally but was represented by any person appointed by any Japanese authority; (c) that it was based on principles unknown to the existing laws; or (d) on any other ground which the appropriate court considers to be sufficient.”

Under this ordinance Abubakar, the first respondent, together with the two other respondents as trustees, took out an originating summons in the High Court of the Colony of Singapore, claiming that they were persons aggrieved by the decree of June 18, 1945, of the Japanese court in the appellant's favour, and applying to set aside this decree, or, alternatively, asking for liberty to appeal against the Japanese decree on grounds therein stated. On learning that the originating summons had been issued, the appellant's solicitors entered a conditional appearance on his behalf, which was followed up by a summons before the judge in chambers, in which the appellant applied that the originating summons might be set aside and all further proceedings under it stayed on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the appellant, who claimed to be “a sovereign ruler”. It is the decision on this summons which now comes before their Lordships on appeal.

The appellant's application was heard in the High Court by GORDON SMITH, J., in March, 1949, and by order, dated Apr. 7, 1949, the summons was dismissed with costs. The learned judge held that at the material time the appellant was a sovereign ruler, but that he had waived his immunity by issuing the originating summons in the Syonan Kotohoin during the Japanese occupation. He held that the proceedings now sought to be stayed were not new proceedings, but were a continuation of the earlier proceedings in which the appellant had for the time being succeeded.

The appellant appealed from the decision of GORDON SMITH, J., to the Court of Appeal of the Colony of Singapore. His appeal was dismissed, but the reasons given by the three learned judges materially differ and must be separately summarised. MURRAY-AYNSLEY, C.J., held that the appellant's claim to be a sovereign ruler could not be established otherwise than by a statement made on behalf of His Majesty George VI to that effect and that the communications then before the court from His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies did not amount to such a statement. He further held that, if the sovereign status of the appellant had been duly established, there would have been no waiver by the appellant of his resulting immunity from the proceedings now taken against him by the respondents. SIR H. C. WILLAN, C.J., on the other hand, held that, in a case where certificates from the Colonial Office were not conclusive one way or the other, the court was not precluded from looking to other evidence in order to determine whether the appellant was an independent sovereign. He considered that the right view to take on all the material before him was that the appellant was an independent sovereign. On the question of waiver, however, he held against the appellant. Waiver of a sovereign's immunity, in a case where the sovereign has himself instituted proceedings, continued, in his view, to operate if the application now made by the respondents to reverse the decree which the appellant had obtained was a continuance of the proceedings instituted by the appellant in the Japanese court. He held that the provisions of the ordinance of 1946 had the effect of making the present application a continuation of such proceedings, and, therefore, the claim by the appellant of immunity from the jurisdiction of the High Court of the Colony of Singapore failed. The third judge, EVANS, J., discussed the question whether other material can be considered on the question of sovereignty when there is no conclusive certificate from a Secretary of State before the court. He held that the Syonan Kotohoin was not the same court as that in which the respondents brought the present proceedings, and that the present proceedings were not the same as the proceedings started by the appellant. But his judgment was not based on his conclusion on these issues. The ground on which this learned judge gave his decision against the appellant was that the appellant, notwithstanding his claim to be an independent sovereign and notwithstanding the view that he had not waived his immunity, was none the less subject to the jurisdiction of the court inasmuch as the matter to be determined was “ . . . one concerning land, which is undoubtedly within the jurisdiction and which is the subject of a private and personal claim of the Sultan, and not a claim of public property of the State.”

Counsel for the respondent cited various dicta, both English and foreign, in support of this view and referred in this connection to the statement in the judgment of SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE, in The Charkieh (1)—a statement which was not, in fact, necessary for the decision—where that learned civilian stated (L.R. 4 A. & E. 97) that a sovereign's exemption from suit “is admitted not to apply to immovable property” and that this is one of “the universally acknowledged exceptions to the general rule of the sovereign's immunity . . .” As will appear hereafter, their Lordships do not find it necessary to pronounce on this proposition in the present appeal.

There are thus three main questions which have been raised in this litigation, the answers to which may be material in deciding it. First, is the appellant in this litigation to be regarded as a foreign sovereign? Secondly, if so, has he waived his immunity so as to disentitle him to a stay of proceedings on the respondents' originating summons? And, thirdly, if both the above questions are answered in the appellant's favour, does this sovereign immunity extend to exclude the jurisdiction of the court in a case where proceedings are connected with his claim to be entitled to immovable property situate within the jurisdiction of the court?

The first of these questions, which gave so much trouble to the courts below, appears to their Lordships to be now definitely answered in the appellant's favour. Subsequent to the judgment and order of the Court of Appeal, correspondence passed between twelve rulers of the Malay States and the then Colonial Secretary in which the former complained that the replies hitherto sent from the Colonial Office in answer to the request of the courts in Singapore for information as to the status of the appellant were ambiguous, and that the Secretary of State, instead of issuing the required certificate, appeared to wish to leave the courts to decide the matter in the light of the recent establishment of the Malay Federation. However, on Feb. 1, 1951, the Secretary of State wrote a further letter to the rulers of the Malay States in which it is categorically asserted that:

“His Majesty's government regard Your Highnesses as independent sovereigns in so far as your relations with His Majesty are concerned.”

At the hearing before the Board this document was tendered to their Lordships, without objection from the respondents, as containing the necessary and conclusive information from the proper quarter. Their Lordships so accept it and take judicial notice of the fact so certified. They can, therefore, proceed on the admitted basis that the appellant was recognised by His Majesty's government at the relevant time as an independent sovereign entitled to the immunities in respect of litigation which attach to that status. This renders it unnecessary to decide in this appeal a point on which some difference of opinion appears to be expressed in the speeches of the majority in Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government (2), viz., whether the status enjoyed by a foreign sovereign in a British court can be established, in case of doubt, only by certificate issued by the appropriate Secretary of State on behalf of the Crown, or whether a court might be entitled, if the Crown failed to answer the inquiry in conclusive terms, to accept and act on "secondary information" of another kind. (Contrast the speeches of VISCOUNT CAVE and VISCOUNT FINLAY with that of LORD SUMNER.)

- A The second question concerns waiver. The appellant himself started the proceedings before the Japanese court, thereby invoking its jurisdiction on his behalf. As plaintiff, he obtained the decree declaring that he was the beneficial owner of the properties in question. If, therefore, the steps taken by the respondents with a view to reversing this decision are in the nature of an appeal from it to a court having jurisdiction to reverse the decision which the appellant has obtained, he could not object to being made respondent in these appeal proceedings, for his original submission to the original court binds him to accept the jurisdiction on appeal. If, on the other hand, the respondents' application to the High Court of the Colony of Singapore to reverse the decree is a "new" proceeding and not a continuation of the previous one, the appellant's objection that he is a foreign sovereign would prevail, so far as the new proceeding impinged on his sovereign immunity. In Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government (2), after the Kelantan government, which was recognised by the British Crown as a sovereign State, had agreed to arbitration and had itself applied to the British court to set aside the award, it was held that, when proceedings were taken against it to enforce the award, this was a different proceeding in which it was entitled to set up its sovereign immunity, notwithstanding that it had waived this immunity in the previous proceedings. VISCOUNT CAVE put the contrast thus ([1924] A.C. 810):
- B
- C
- D

" . . . the application for leave to enforce the award is a new proceeding, and though connected with the earlier application is distinct from it."

- E Here, as WILLAN, C.J., points out, the application of the respondents is concerned with the very matter raised by the appellant in the Japanese court, viz., the title to these properties. Their Lordships are of opinion that s. 3 of the ordinance of 1946, on its true construction, authorises an application in the nature of an appeal from the Japanese decree. The ordinance does not treat Japanese decrees as of no effect. Neither does it treat them as conclusive. It provides for their review, with the result that they might either be confirmed or modified or reversed. The procedure authorised is essentially a carrying on of the proceeding already instituted and not a new and distinct proceeding. The language of s. 3 actually speaks of an appeal, and the purpose of the ordinance is to provide a means of revising, and, if necessary, correcting, decrees made by the Japanese court during the occupation. No doubt, it is anomalous for a tribunal set up by one authority to operate as a Court of Appeal from the decisions of a tribunal
- F
- G set up by a different and previous authority, but this is what the ordinance of 1946 does, and s. 3 (4) indicates good and necessary reasons for doing it. Otherwise, an erroneous decision given by the Japanese court affecting private rights would stand without the possibility of correction. In the present instance the Japanese court has decided, whether rightly or wrongly, that deeds previously executed by the appellant which purported to convey his private property in
- H Singapore to others were invalid and that the properties still belong to him. In deciding this issue, the proper law to apply to the question of title is the same as it was before the Japanese occupation, inasmuch as military occupation, and even annexation, does not in itself change the law in the area occupied. The only change is in the court and in the judges who are to apply the law. The question, therefore, which is raised by the originating summons issued by the respondents and which is to be determined by the High Court of the Colony of Singapore is whether the decision of the Japanese court was right or wrong, and to determine this the appellant is made respondent in what is, in substance, an appeal in proceedings which, by force of the ordinance of 1946, are a continuance of the proceedings which the appellant himself instituted, and, in any case, are put in the same position as an appeal by s. 3.

The conclusion that the appellant must be treated as having submitted to the jurisdiction in the respondents' current proceedings makes it irrelevant to consider the third question which would otherwise have called for decision. That is the question whether the principle that affords to a foreign independent sovereign immunity from process in our courts is subject to any exception in the case of proceedings that concern the title to immovable property situate within the area of the court's territorial jurisdiction. The point was, however, very fully argued during the course of the hearing and, moreover, in view of its public importance, their Lordships invited and received the assistance of the Attorney-General to aid their consideration. While, therefore, they think that it would be wrong to express an opinion on an issue that does not, properly speaking, now arise, they are unwilling to conclude their advice to Her Majesty without making reference to one aspect of this controversy which was much canvassed before them.

Their Lordships do not consider that there has been finally established in England (from whose rules the rules to be applied in the court at Singapore would not differ) any absolute rule that a foreign independent sovereign cannot be impleaded in our courts in any circumstances. It seems desirable to say this much, having regard to inferences that might be drawn from some parts of the Court of Appeal's judgment in The Parlement Belge (3), and from the speech of LORD ATKIN in Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. (4). The word "implead" is capable of more than one meaning when used in relation to judicial proceedings which themselves comprehend a great variety of forms, and further distinctions have been suggested between what is direct and what is indirect impleading, but for the present purpose the definition of "impleading" can be taken to be that which is laid down by BRETT, L.J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in The Parlement Belge (3), where he compares the position of a ship-owner whose vessel is seized in proceedings alleging liability arising from a collision with the position of a subsequent innocent purchaser of the vessel. The lord justice says (5 P.D. 219):

"Either is affected in his interests by the judgment of a court which is bound to give him the means of knowing that it is about to proceed to affect those interests, and that it is bound to hear him if he objects. That is, in our opinion, an impleading."

Impleading, in this sense, does not depend merely on an answer to the more technical question whether a person is actually a party or ought to be regarded as a necessary party to the proceedings. There have certainly been cases in the Court of Chancery in which a foreign sovereign has been impleaded to the extent that the rights to a trust fund under the jurisdiction of the court have been the subject of adjudication, despite the fact that the sovereign has a possible interest in the fund. The best known case is Lariviere v. Morgan (5), and, although the decision in that case was reversed on its facts when it reached the House of Lords, LORD CAIRNS, L.C. (L.R. 7 H.L. 430), seems to have felt no doubt as to the propriety of the jurisdiction exercised. Indeed, in Duke of Brunswick v. King of Hanover (6), LORD LANGDALE, M.R., evidently contemplated (6 Beav. 39) that in proceedings of such a kind the name of the foreign sovereign would be included among those of the defendants. An action in rem against a ship impleads persons who are interested in the ship. That is settled law. There is even high authority for the view that such persons are or may be directly impleaded by such proceedings: see the Cristina case (4), per LORD ATKIN ([1938] 1 All E.R. 721) and per LORD WRIGHT (ibid., 730). If, however, it had been definitely determined that in no case could a foreign sovereign be impleaded without his consent, there could have been no justification for reserving the case of a sovereign's ship engaged in ordinary commerce—a reservation that was, in fact, made by the majority of the House of Lords in the Cristina case (4). For a sovereign is impleaded by an action in rem against his ship, whether it is engaged in ordinary commerce or is employed for purposes that are more usually distinguished as public. The extent of the impleading is the same in the one case as in the other. Indeed, a great deal of the reasoning of the judgment in The Parlement Belge (3) would be inexplicable if there could be applied a universal rule without possible exception to the effect that, once the circumstance of a foreign sovereign being impleaded against his will can be established, a proceeding necessarily becomes defective by virtue of that circumstance alone. To say this is merely to disavow an alleged absolute and universal rule. It does nothing to throw doubt on the existence of the general principle. Nor is it necessary for their Lordships to express any opinion in this case on the question whether and, if so, to what extent proceedings which concern the title to immovable property within the jurisdiction form an exception from this general rule. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellants must pay the costs of the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: E. F. Turner & Sons (for the appellants); Peacock & Goddard (for the respondents).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re BANQUE DES MARCHANDS DE MOSCOU
(KROUPETSCHESKY). ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE v.
THE LIQUIDATOR.

Re BANQUE DES MARCHANDS DE MOSCOU
(KROUPETSCHESKY). WILENKIN v. THE LIQUIDATOR.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), February 26, 27, 28, 1952.]

Company—Winding-up—Foreign bank—Bank nationalised by foreign decree—Debt situated abroad—Claim by customer against English assets.

A bank, which had its head office in Moscow, and a branch office in Petrograd, but no branch office in England, was dissolved, according to Russian law, on or about Dec. 14, 1917, by a decree of that date of the Soviet government by which the bank, in common with other banks, was nationalised, its assets and liabilities being taken over by the State Bank. On May 30, 1932, a winding-up order was made in England in respect of the bank. The R. company sought to prove in the liquidation of the bank in England in respect of the equivalent in sterling (at the rate of exchange current on Dec. 14, 1917) of (a) a sum of roubles 1,332,992 which, in December, 1917, stood to the credit of a current account with the bank in the name of the R. company; (b) a sum of roubles 4,500,000 which in December, 1917, stood to the credit of a deposit account in the name of the R. company; (c) a sum in respect of interest on the latter account; and (d) the value of bonds, shares and other securities deposited with the bank for safe custody by the R. company (as a customer) in Petrograd. The liquidator having rejected the proof of the R. company, HELD: (i) the proper law of the contract between the R. company and the bank was Russian law, and so the claims of the R. company, which were against the bank in Russia, were regulated by Russian law; the effect of the Russian decree of nationalisation was to extinguish the rights of the R. company against the bank; and, therefore, at the date of the winding-up order in England there was no subsisting debt or liability owed by the bank to the R. company.

Dictum of MAUGHAM, J., in Re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade ([1933] Ch. 766), applied.

(ii) the Soviet State having taken possession of the securities deposited by the company with the bank, with regard to this part of the claim the bank would be entitled to plead that it had been evicted by title paramount, and, therefore, discharged from liability.

Ross v. Edwards & Co. (1895) (73 L.T. 100), applied.

Company—Winding-up—Services rendered—Claim for remuneration—Bank dissolved by Russian decree subsequently ordered to be wound-up by English court—Services rendered in relation to assets of bank after decree of dissolution, but before winding-up order.

Between March, 1930, and the date of the winding-up order in May, 1932, W., an expert in Russian law, assisted in various legal proceedings relating to the bank, and, largely owing to his advice with regard to a claim made in respect of assets of the bank by the Deutsche Bank, that claim was finally defeated. W. claimed in the winding-up of the bank in respect of his expenses and for a sum by way of remuneration.

HELD: although for the purposes of winding-up the bank it was necessary notionally to revivify it (notwithstanding its dissolution under Russian law), it could not be regarded as having been in existence at the time of the rendering of, and for the purpose of receiving, W.'s services, and, therefore, W. could not be regarded, whether as an agent of necessity or in any other capacity, as having rendered services to the bank for which he could claim in the winding-up.

AS TO DEBTS PROVABLE IN A WINDING-UP, see HALSBURY, 1949 Edn., Vol. 5, pp. 739-747, paras. 1200-1217; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 10, pp. 925-930, 932, 933, Nos. 6343-6370, 6385-6397.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, [1933] Ch. 745; 102 L.J.Ch. 309; 149 L.T. 65; Digest Supp.
- (2) Princess Paley Olga v. Weisz, [1929] 1 K.B. 718; 98 L.J.K.B. 465; 141 L.T. 207; Digest Supp.
- (3) The Jupiter (No. 3), [1927] P. 250; 97 L.J.P. 33; 137 L.T. 333; Digest Supp.
- (4) Sedgwick, Collins & Co. v. Russia Insurance Co. of Petrograd, [1926] 1 K.B. 1; 95 L.J.K.B. 7; 133 L.T. 808; affd. H.L., sub nom. Employers' Liability Assurance Corpn. v. Sedgwick, Collins & Co., [1927] A.C. 95; 95 L.J.K.B. 1015; 136 L.T. 72; Digest Supp.
- (5) Aksionairnoye Obschestvo A.M. Luther v. Sagor (James) & Co., [1921] 3 K.B. 532; 90 L.J.K.B. 1202; 125 L.T. 705; 11 Digest 309, 17.
- (6) Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic) v. Cannon Brewery Co., Ltd., [1919] A.C. 744; 88 L.J.Ch. 464; 121 L.T. 361; 83 J.P. 261; 11 Digest 548, 512.
- (7) Bank Voor Handel en Scheepvaart v. Slatford, [1951] 2 All E.R. 779.
- (8) Ross v. Edwards & Co., (1895), 73 L.T. 100; 3 Digest 102, 288.
- (9) Jebara v. Ottoman Bank, [1927] 2 K.B. 254; 96 L.J.K.B. 581; 137 L.T. 101; revsd. H.L. sub nom. Ottoman Bank v. Jebara, [1928] A.C. 269; 97 L.J.K.B. 502; 139 L.T. 194; Digest Supp.
- (10) Prager v. Blatspiel, Stamp & Heacock, Ltd., [1924] 1 K.B. 566; 93 L.J.K.B. 410; 130 L.T. 672; Digest Supp.
- (11) Nicholson v. Chapman, (1793), Hy. Bl. 254; 126 E.R. 536; 3 Digest 66, 89.
- (12) Binstead v. Buck, (1776), 2 Wm. Bl. 1117; 96 E.R. 660; 3 Digest 66, 88.

ADJOURNED SUMMONSES issued by two claimants in the winding-up of the Banque des Marchands de Moscou for orders that the decisions of the liquidator rejecting their proofs be reversed.

R. Gwyn Rees for the Royal Exchange Assurance, the applicants in the first summons.

Peter Foster for Marc Wilenkin, the applicant in the second summons.

Raymond Walton for the liquidator (in both summonses).

VAISEY, J.: These two cases relate to the validity or otherwise of two proofs in the liquidation of this company, the Banque des Marchands de Moscou (Koupetschesky), which is being wound-up. They raise quite different points, but, inasmuch as the background to both is the same, I shall try to deal with them, to begin with, together. This bank had no branch or office in London, but its headquarters were at Moscow, and it had a branch at Petrograd. On May 30, 1932, a winding-up order was made by this court in respect of this concern. A liquidator was duly appointed, and the assets which came into his hands were of very considerable amount, running into six figures, and there was also a very large number of claims against such assets, among them being these two, the first of which is a claim by the Royal Exchange Assurance, and the second a claim by a Mr. Wilenkin.

The claim of the Royal Exchange Assurance was embodied in a proof which is made up of various items. There is, first, a claim for a sum of roubles which, translated into English currency, amounts to £53,320. Secondly, there is a claim to simple interest on that sum at five per cent. per annum from Dec. 14, 1917, which was roughly speaking the date when, under Russian legislation, this bank was dissolved and ceased to exist, to May 30, 1932, which, as I have already said, was the date of the winding-up order. That sum amounts to no less than £38,420, but it is admitted that, so far as that part of the claim is concerned, it cannot on any footing or any view of the matter be substantiated. Then there is a claim to the further sum of 4,500,000 roubles, which being translated into English currency is £180,000. That represents the balance which on the said Dec. 14, 1917, stood to the credit of a deposit account of the Royal Exchange Assurance with the bank. Interest is calculated on that at £129,690 over the same period, i.e., from the dissolution of the bank in Russia to the date of the winding-up order, and although that sum is admitted to be not quite accurate, because the proper rate of interest is five per cent. less five per cent. of five per cent., which leaves a balance of $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., that is a mere matter of figures on which I need not further expatiate. Finally a claim is made to the value, on Dec. 14, 1914, of certain bonds, shares and securities which were deposited by the Royal Exchange Assurance with the bank for safe custody. Particulars of those have been supplied and they have been valued at a date which was anterior to the Russian revolution, the last date at which it was possible to attach any value to securities of that kind, at £369,393. The total, eliminating the interest, is something over £700,000. The first case before me relates to that proof.

Counsel for the liquidator has submitted to me that there is a very short and simple answer to this claim, and that answer rests, putting it broadly, on a principle which was laid down by MAUGHAM, J., in Re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade (1). The principle was laid down in clear terms, although it might be that in that case it was only said by way of dictum. Put shortly, the point which the liquidator takes on this proof is that these claims all relate to a debt or a liability which was owing or accrued in Russia, and the position of the Royal Exchange Assurance in this regard is no different in quality from the position of any other customer or debtor of the bank in Russia. It is not, and cannot be, I think, disputed that according to our law the debt is situate where the debtor is, and I do not think it can be disputed that these claims have to be regulated by Russian law and English law does not come into this matter at all. What is submitted on behalf of the liquidator is that here we have a debt or obligation that, undoubtedly, did exist prior to the legislation in Russia, which has been called confiscatory and which has, perhaps not unfairly, been so regarded, and that there were subsisting debts and obligations of the bank to its customers, including the present claimants. It is said that that is all very well, but although the Russian legislation, by reason of its confiscatory character, has no extra-territorial effect, it is completely binding so far as concerns things which belong to the debtor and are referable to Russian territory, and here we have a debt or a claim, the remedy for which at the material date—that is to say, at the date when the confiscatory legislation took effect—was a debt which was liable to be discharged in Russia and nowhere else. The Royal Exchange Assurance, it is said, stands in no different position from any Russian customer or creditor of the bank, and the claims of the Royal Exchange Assurance and every other claim in Russia having regard to matters that have taken place in Russian territory have been effectively dealt with by the legislation to which I have referred.

In Re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade (1) MAUGHAM, J., lays down that, among other things, the Soviet decrees in question—the confiscatory decrees which nationalised banks and transferred their assets and liabilities elsewhere—could not have the effect of extinguishing or transferring debts regarded in English law as being locally situate in England, but from that it follows inevitably, as I think, that the decrees did have that effect in regard to debts and obligations which in English law are regarded as being locally situate, not in England, but in Russia. The learned judge put it in this way ([1933] Ch. 766):

“There is, however, a real question in dispute, and that is whether the debt to the petitioner was or was not locally situate in Russia at the date of the decrees of 1917 and 1918 above referred to. If it was locally situate in Russia, it seems to me that as the effect of the legislation the debt is no longer due by the bank as a corporation, and that the only claim of the petitioner is against the Soviet State. By the decree of December, 1917, the assets and liabilities of the bank within Soviet territory were taken over by the People’s Bank, and this in my opinion involves the destruction of the original debt and a kind of statutory novation (in some sense, perhaps, only a theoretical one) whereby the State bank became liable to discharge it. This legislation must be taken to be effective as regards property situate in the territory of the Soviet Republic (see Princess Paley Olga v. Weisz (2)) in which it was held that the English courts will not inquire into the legality of acts done by a recognised foreign government against or in relation to its own subjects in respect of property situate in its own territory. It seems to me to be clear that the same principle must apply, whether the property consists of chattels or of a debt regarded in this country as having a local situation. If, then, it were to be established that the debt of the petitioner was represented by a credit to him in the Archangel branch of the bank, I should be of opinion that that debt had ceased to exist . . . If the debt was primarily recoverable in London, I am of opinion that it was not affected by the Soviet legislation, even though it was due to a person who was a Russian subject at the date of the nationalisation decrees. Its locality must be taken to be the place where the debt was in the ordinary course recoverable . . . The decrees in question could not according to our laws have the effect of extinguishing the debt, if locally situate here, or of transferring it to the Soviet republic.”

After referring to The Jupiter No. 3 (3), the learned judge said (ibid., 767):

“Moreover, it is evident that our courts have never entertained the view that a debt incurred here by a foreign corporation permitted to carry on business here under English law can be discharged by a foreign statute . . . It may be observed that the decrees of the Russian legislature in relation to insurance companies were on the same lines as those in relation to private banking companies at any rate to this extent, that the insurance businesses in Russia were nationalised so that the assets of such companies, so far as Russian statutes could effect such a result, were transferred to the

Russian State. In the Court of Appeal SARGANT, L.J., in his judgment [in Sedgwick, Collins & Co. v. Russia Insurance Co. of Petrograd (4)] observed as follows ([1926] 1 K.B. 15): 'Nor do I think that the position of creditors here as against property of the Russia Insurance Company here, such as debts owing to them from debtors in this country, is altered by legislation or decrees of the Russian sovereign power which "nationalised" the undertaking and assets of the Russia Insurance Company.'

A I agree that those statements are obiter, but they seem to me to be founded on accurate principles, and they seem to me to govern the present case.

Other authorities were cited to me, for instance, Aksionairnoye Obschestvo A. M. Luther v. James Sagor & Co. (5) where it was held that, as the government of this country had recognised the Soviet government as the de facto government of Russia, the validity of the decree there in question, which was not the same
B decree as that with which we are now concerned, could not be impugned. In the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., the matter is put thus ([1921] 3 K.B. 558):

"But it appears a serious breach of international comity, if a State is recognised as a sovereign independent State, to postulate that its legislation is 'contrary to essential principles of justice and morality'. Such an allegation might well with a susceptible foreign government become a casus belli; and should in my view be the action of the sovereign through his ministers, and not of the judges in reference to a State which their sovereign has recognised. The English courts act on the rule 'that an intention to take away the property of a subject without giving to him a legal right to compensation for the loss of it is not to be imputed to the legislature unless that intention is expressed in unequivocal terms': Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic) v. Cannon Brewery Co., Ltd. (6). If it were they must give effect to it, and can hardly be more rigid in their dealings with foreign legislation. Individuals must contribute to the welfare of the State, and at present British citizens who may contribute to the State more than half their income in income tax and super tax, and a large proportion of their capital in death duties, can hardly declare a foreign State immoral which considers (though we may think wrongly) that to vest individual property in the State as representing all the citizens is the best form of proprietary right. I do not feel able to come to the conclusion that the legislation of a State recognised by my sovereign as an independent sovereign State is so contrary to moral principle that the judges ought not to recognise it. The responsibility for recognition or non-recognition with the consequences of each rests on the political advisers of the sovereign and not on the judges."

Then there is the case, to which allusion has already been made, Princess Paley Olga v. Weisz (2). It is sufficient if I read the headnote, which is:

"The English courts will not inquire into the validity of acts done by a recognised foreign government against its own subjects in respect of property situate in its own territory."

G Pausing there, it seems to me to be equally true that it will not inquire into the validity of acts so done against persons who dealt with it within its own territory. The headnote goes on:

"In 1918 a section of Russian revolutionaries took and retained possession of movables in Russia belonging to the plaintiff against her will. The act of those revolutionaries was subsequently adopted by the Soviet Republic, which was recognised in 1924 by the British government as the de jure government of Russia. In 1928 the movables in question were sold in Russia by the Soviet Republic to the defendants, who brought them to England. In an action by the plaintiff to recover those movables or damages for their detention or conversion:—Held, that the action failed, as the court could not inquire into the validity of the acts of a foreign sovereign Power which had been recognised by the government of this country."

H

It is perfectly clear that these courts do not recognise acts of that character which are done with respect to property which is within their jurisdiction, as, for instance, the assets of a company in this country, but that is not the case here. We are here dealing with a matter which, both in regard to the property in question, i.e., these debts and claims, and in regard to the proper forum for their liquidation and satisfaction, is entirely Russian. It seems to me that on those principles the claim of the Royal Exchange Assurance must fail.

I might, perhaps, refer to a recent decision of DEVLIN, J., in Bank Voor Handel en Scheepvaart v. Slatford (7), where it was held that and, therefore, it was held that a decree of the Netherlands government was ineffective to transfer certain gold and bank balances to that government and that they could be and were rightly vested in the Custodian of Enemy Property.

“(i) foreign legislation purporting to have effect over property within the territory of the United Kingdom would not be recognised by the English courts, it being immaterial (a) whether or not the legislation was confiscatory, and (b) that it was the legislation of an allied government made with the purpose of keeping property out of the hands of a common enemy; the question whether foreign legislation should, in particular circumstances, be recognised on the ground of public policy was a matter, not for the courts, but for the legislature . . .”

Counsel for the applicants admitted that, if the case was governed by the principle laid down by MAUGHAM, J., in Re Russian Bank for Foreign Trade (1), the claim of his client must necessarily fail. I think it does fail, and I think that it fails on that comparatively short and simple ground. It seems to me that the claim of the Royal Exchange Assurance is governed by Russian law. I think that that was the proper law of the contract between those claimants and the bank. I think that that claim can be and could have been discharged according to the provisions, and, I think, only according to the provisions of Russian law, and that the rights and remedies of the claimants were all put an end to by one or other of the decrees applicable in this case. The first of those decrees was dated Dec. 14, 1917, and can be referred to as a decree of nationalisation of the banks, and the second was a decree of the People's Commissars dated Jan. 26, 1918; and I do not think it can be disputed that, according to the plain meaning and plain language of those decrees, the liabilities and assets of this bank in Russia were transferred to and made over to the People's Bank or the Russian State. The decree of Dec. 14, 1917, provided:

“In the interests of the proper organisation of national economy, in the interests of a thorough eradication of banking speculation and the complete emancipation of the workers, peasants, and the whole labouring population from exploitation by banking capital, and also with the object of establishing a single People's Bank of the Russian Republic, genuinely serving the interests of the people and the poorest classes, the Central Executive Committee hereby decrees: 1. Banking business is declared a State monopoly. 2. All existing private joint stock banks and banking houses are merged with the State Bank. 3. The assets and liabilities of the liquidated banks are taken over by the State Bank. 4. The method of effecting the merger of private banks with the State Bank shall be determined by a special decree. 5. The temporary administration of the business of private banks shall be entrusted to the council of the State Bank. 6. The interests of small depositors shall be fully safeguarded.”

I do not think that the Royal Exchange Assurance would be likely to be regarded in Russia or anywhere else as a small depositor. Although the effect of that may be very devastating, in fact on the face of it, of course, it is quite capable of a beneficent construction. If the State bank really had taken over the assets and liabilities of the liquidated bank and was prepared to honour the obligations of the liquidated bank, no harm would have been done, but that is not my concern. The matter strikes me in this way, that when once I have come to the conclusion that this decree must be regarded as valid, it is against the State bank that this claim should be made. The purpose of this decree is not so much confiscation as merger and transfer, and surely to transfer the assets of a particular corporation to a larger corporation in which the smaller is said to be merged is in itself innocuous.

The other decree is the decree of January, 1918, and is in these terms:

“Having in view to remove capitalists who owned shares of the abolished private banks, absolutely from the direction of the activities of the People’s Bank of the Russian Republic, which is being created, and continuing in this way the liquidation of the regime of the omnipotence of bankers, the Council of People’s Commissars decrees: 1. The joint stock capital of the late private banks (subscription, surplus and special) is transferred to the State Bank of the Russian Republic on the basis of complete confiscation. 2. All banking stock certificates are annulled and any payment of dividends thereon is absolutely terminated. 3. All banking stock certificates are subject to immediate surrender by the present holders to the local offices of the State Bank. 4. The holders of banking stock certificates who do not have them in their possession are obligated to submit to the offices of the State Bank registry lists of banking stock certificates belonging to them indicating their exact location. 5. The holders of banking stock certificates who shall have failed to surrender same (in accordance with para. 3) or who shall have failed to submit their registry lists (in accordance with para. 4) within a period of two weeks following the day of the publication of the present decree are punishable by confiscation of all the property belonging to them. 6. All dealings and instruments in connection with the transfer of the banking stock certificates are absolutely prohibited.”

Anyone interfering with this process is said to be punishable for terms of up to three years.

If those decrees take effect, and, I think, it must be assumed they have for this purpose taken effect, I think there is no longer, and there was not at the date of the winding-up, any subsisting debt owing from the bank to the claimants on which this proof could be founded. It is no business of mine to criticise the decrees or to express any view as to their propriety if, I think, as I do think, that they were wholly effective and must be assumed in these courts to have been fully effective, and I think that when the winding-up order was made the debt and the obligation on which this claim is founded had ceased to exist, either at the end of 1917 or the beginning of 1918, it matters not which.

The proof as originally delivered has been rejected. The amended proof, which, I suppose, is still before the liquidator, must also, in my opinion, be rejected. Though one feels some sympathy with the applicants, after all they took a risk in trading in a foreign country in the manner in which they did, and I do not see that anything can be done about it in this winding-up. The result is that as regards the first of these two summonses the claim fails.

There is one further point. As regards the securities which were deposited with the bank, not as security but merely for safe custody, there was the further point, which, I think, is a good point, that a bailee of goods who has been evicted by title paramount has no longer any liability under the bailment. That is, I think, established by Ross v. Edwards & Co. (8) in the Privy Council, to which the headnote is:

“In ordinary circumstances a bailee is estopped from disputing the title of the bailor; but, if there is an eviction by title paramount, the bailee is, in the absence of any special contract, discharged from all liability.”

In delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, LORD MACNAGHTEN said (73 L.T. 101):

"It is clear that the bailee after acknowledging that he holds the goods on account of the bailor cannot say to the bailor: 'The goods are not yours'; but it is equally clear that if there is that which amounts to eviction by title paramount the bailee is discharged from his promise. In that event he is under no liability to the bailor unless he has made a special contract with him or is in some way to blame for his loss."

Whatever may have been the value of this fund at the relevant or any other date, there is no doubt, I think, that these two decrees of the Soviet government have evicted the bank in the sense that the State has taken possession of these securities and thereby enabled the bank to plead and allege that they have in fact been evicted by title paramount. I think that, so far as concerns the claim to the securities or the value of them as distinguished from the claim in respect of the two accounts, the current and deposit accounts, that decision in the light of those decrees affords a ground upon which the liquidator is bound to reject the claim as regards the value of these particular securities.

The other claim is by Mr. Wilenkin, who is an expert in Russian law, and who has, undoubtedly, in the course of this extremely varied and tortuous litigation concerning the bank, rendered good services which have been a great deal of help. I have now to look at the way in which his claim is formulated. It rests on this. He says that between March, 1930, and the date of the winding-up order in May, 1932, he rendered such services to the bank or the liquidator, or those interested in the bank or the winding-up, as entitled him as of right to claim against the assets in the winding-up for those services. I say at once, that there may be no doubt about it, that, if this claim is sustainable, the amount for which Mr. Wilenkin seeks reimbursement, viz., £850, is regarded by the liquidator as in itself fair and reasonable. There is no doubt that, but for his intervention and activities, the Deutsche Bank, in circumstances which I need not describe in detail, might have got away with a judgment for a very large sum of money against these assets. The matter was carried to the Court of Appeal, where it was held that the claim could not be sustained, and, indeed, that the whole of the proceedings under which that judgment had been obtained was bad from beginning to end. Unless that appeal had been brought—and it is admitted that it was brought largely at the instigation and under the auspices of the present claimant—the Deutsche Bank would have obtained a judgment, to which as matters turned out, it had no shadow of right. Therefore, there is no doubt that Mr. Wilenkin has contributed something to the winding-up and to the rights of those interested in the winding-up, for which prima facie he ought to receive payment.

The claimant sets out and summarises what he is asking to be paid for in the proof which he has lodged. He claims the balance of remuneration and out of pocket expenses due to him for professional services rendered to the Moscow Merchants Bank from March, 1930, particularly as from March, 1931,

"when the hearing of the proceedings relating to the Deutsche Bank claim came before ROCHE, J., including further attendances at the court in June, 1931, in the same connection when the case was continued before ROWLATT, J., various attendances upon and conferences with Messrs. Slaughter & May in connection with the claim of Frederick Huth, in October, 1931, and subsequently; numerous discussions with Mr. Czamanski [one of the ex-directors of the bank] and advising him in connection with lodging appeal against the judgment given in favour of the Deutsche Bank; conferences with Messrs. Kimbers, Williams & Co., generally discussing with them the details of the appeal and choice of counsel, also conferences with counsel; assisting Messrs. Kimbers, Williams & Co. in connection with the preparation of the appeal; attendances at the Court of Appeal daily . . . also numerous discussions with Mr. Czamanski throughout; various journeys to Paris and Liverpool, preparing various observations, perusing and amending various drafts; numerous letters and telegrams to Mr. Czamanski and others throughout, also various telephone conversations with him in Paris and Switzerland and elsewhere."

- What was the position when those alleged services were rendered? I say, A "alleged", because the difficulty is, to whom were those services rendered? At that time the winding-up order had not been made, and the difficulty is to discover to exactly what extent during that interim period (i.e., in the period between the dissolution of the bank in Russia and the date of the winding-up order in England) the bank was in existence from the point of view of our law. There is no doubt that to some extent a company, such as the bank, which is B being wound-up is deemed for some purposes to have been in existence before the winding-up order was made, but not for all purposes, and it is only hypothetically revived or re-constituted in regard to that interim period, that is to say, before the winding-up order was made, for the limited purpose of enabling the winding-up order to be carried into effect. I cannot find any authority that after the winding-up order has been made one has to look at C the past history and put the wraith of the company back into existence, enjoying activities and subjecting itself to obligations just as if it had never been dissolved. In all the various statements that have been made as to how far the company notionally exists, I cannot find any statement which justifies me in saying that it exists for the purpose of employing agents for straightening out its affairs, and so forth, during that period when it is completely dead, subject D only to such measure of revivification as must be deemed to have arisen through the making of the winding-up order. It seems to me that if I were to hold that the company was, so to speak, hypothetically revived ex post facto (if I may coin a phrase which is both hybrid and unsatisfactory) there is no limit to the amount of revivification which must be attributed to a company in the situation which I have been trying to describe.
- E I think that Mr. Wilenkin's activities may have been very useful and may have produced a very satisfactory result, but I cannot see that on any ground they could have been provided to the company, which was dissolved, or to the liquidator, who was not appointed, or to the people who were interested in the equity, if there was an equity, in this bank. One is driven back to this strange notion of an agency of necessity. But an agent has first to have a principal. Where in this F case is the principal? I cannot find one. The only ground on which this claim could be allowed would be if I decided as a matter of law that this company, for the purpose of Mr. Wilenkin's activity, was in existence and was in fact employing Mr. Wilenkin in and about its business and actions. It seems to me that these metaphysical conceptions are extremely difficult, and when there is a hypothesis on a hypothesis such as I have when it is said that the non-existent company was G none the less deemed to be employing a non-appointed agent to conduct its non-existent affairs, one gets into a maze of metaphysics (if that is the right word) from which there is no logical escape. The whole thing seems to me to be far too subtle and complicated to convince anybody that one could adopt it as a ground for admitting such a claim as the present.
- H There is no doubt that when the bank was dissolved in Russia it was dissolved for all purposes, and that during the interregnum, i.e., before its partial revivification by the making of the winding-up order, it could neither sue nor be sued. That, I think, is quite clear on the authorities. So far as there were any assets which ought to have belonged to it if it had not been dissolved, if I may put it in that hypothetical way, I take it that those would have become vested in the Crown as bona vacantia, and that the Crown's title, no doubt, was defeasible. There is no suggestion that Mr. Wilenkin can be deemed to have been acting as agent, either of necessity or otherwise, for the Crown. I cannot see that the making of the winding-up order on any of the authorities can be held to have had the effect of validating things that were done for the benefit of the bank while it was, so to speak, in the grave. I find the greatest difficulty in formulating a way in which this claim can be put. It has been said in these courts that the principle relating to agents of necessity ought not to be extended. I think it would be extending it very much if I were to extend the doctrine of agency of necessity to agency on behalf of a non-existent person. I cannot see my way to do that. It is true that the liquidator might have thought it proper to make some sort of ex gratia or compassionate grant to Mr Wilenkin for any expenses to which he had been put, but to say that Mr. Wilenkin has some sort of right in the winding-up which he can enforce by putting in and establishing a proof seems to me to go beyond anything which the principles, as I understand them, can possibly justify.

I think, perhaps, it may be useful for me to refer to a short passage in the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Jebara v. Ottoman Bank (9) as throwing some little light on this conception of the agency of necessity. That case, I may say, was reversed in the House of Lords, but the observation of SCRUTTON, L.J., did not thereby lose any of its force, nor was it affected by the decision of the highest court. He said ([1927] 2 K.B. 270):

"It was argued that if the original contracts were void on the outbreak of war, the bank became agents of necessity and could justify their action in that way. I am not sure that it is not an answer to say that they never thought of themselves in that light, or considered whether it was necessary to act; they thought they were carrying out their contracts. But considerable difficulties arise on the question of agent of necessity in English law. Until recently it was treated as limited to certain classes of agents of whom masters of ships were the most prominent. High authorities had doubted whether it could be extended . . . Many of the authorities are collected in a recent judgment of McCARDIE, J., in Prager's case (10) . . . He takes the view that judges should expand the common law to meet the needs of expanding society, and proceeds to expand the doctrine of agent of necessity without clearly defining the limits, if any, of its expansion. The difficulty may be seen by considering the case of the finder of perishable goods or chattels which need expenditure to preserve them. If the finder incurs such expenditure, can he recover it from the true owner when he finds him, as his 'agent of necessity'? EYRE, C.J., raises this difficulty in the case above cited [Nicholson v. Chapman (11)], and cites Binstead v. Buck (12), the case of the pointer dog. The pointer dog was lost, and his finder fed him for twenty weeks, and claimed the cost from his owner when he appeared, but the claim was treated as unarguable. The expansion desired by McCARDIE, J., becomes less difficult when the agent of necessity develops from an original and subsisting agency, and only applies itself to unforeseen events not provided for in the original contract, which is usually the case where a shipmaster is agent of necessity. But the position seems quite different when there is no pre-existing agency, as in the case of a finder of perishable chattels or animals, and still more difficult when there is a pre-existing agency, but it has become illegal and void by reason of war, and the same reason will apply to invalidate any implied agency of necessity."

That is one of the cases which seems to give a very salutary warning that this is a doctrine with which I am not entitled to play (if I may use that expression) in order to give effect to a claim which I might consider on broad grounds to be not unmeritorious. It seems to me that in this case the attempt to base the claim on agency of necessity is a counsel of despair. No one suggests that this gentleman was the agent of the company before its dissolution; nobody suggests that there was a pre-existing agency which could be carried on by the services rendered; and it seems to me that the difficulty of finding the principal, the difficulty of establishing the agency as a legal conception capable of being the foundation of a legal claim, defeats this argument.

Applications dismissed.

Solicitors: Linklaters & Paines (for the Royal Exchange Co., Ltd.); Simpson, North, Harley & Co. (for Marc Wilenkin); Slaughter & May (for the liquidator).
[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

MOSES v. LOVEGROVE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Birkett and Romer, L.JJ.), April 25, 28, 29, 1952.]

B Limitation of Action—Land—Adverse possession—De-controlled dwelling-house—No rent paid by tenant—Accrual of right of action—House again controlled—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 9 (2), s. 10 (1), s. 16.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Rent book—Evidence of terms of tenancy.

C In 1934 the plaintiff purchased a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, the defendant being then the tenant in occupation. In 1935 the house was de-controlled. On May 28, 1938, the defendant made the last payment of rent. On Sept. 1, 1939, the premises became again controlled by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. In an action for possession and arrears of rent of six years the defendant pleaded that both claims were barred by reason of the Limitation Act, 1939. The plaintiff, while conceding that there was adverse possession from June, 1938, till September, 1939, contended that (i) the re-introduction of rent control ended the defendant's adverse possession, and (ii) that the rent book given to the defendant constituted a lease in writing within the meaning of s. 9 (3) of the Limitation Act, 1939.

E HELD: (i) the existence of adverse possession did not postulate an unqualified right to recover the property in the owner thereof, and therefore, the coming into operation of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, while qualifying the plaintiff's right to recover, did not have the effect of terminating the period of adverse possession.

(ii) the rent book did not constitute a "lease in writing" within s. 9 (3).

FOR THE LIMITATION ACT, 1939, s. 9 (2), s. 10 (1) and s. 16, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 1170, 1171, and 1175, respectively.

F Cases referred to:

(1) Re Jolly, [1900] 2 Ch. 616; 69 L.J.Ch. 661; 83 L.T. 118; 32 Digest 484, 1467.

(2) Warren v. Murray, [1894] 2 Q.B. 648; 64 L.J.Q.B. 42; 71 L.T. 458; 32 Digest 453, 1194.

G APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., made at Bromley County Court, and dated Feb. 5, 1952, dismissing an action by the plaintiff for the recovery of possession of a dwelling-house and arrears of rent.

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and Ricardo for the plaintiff.

Bassett, Q.C., and Chope for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

H April 29. SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The plaintiff claims possession of premises at 7, Kent Road, West Wickham, Kent, and to recover £163 odd as six years' arrears of rent in respect of the same premises. The defence to the claim is that the plaintiff's title has been extinguished under s. 16 of the Limitation Act, 1939. The county court judge decided in favour of the defendant's contention, and I think he was right. There is no dispute as to the facts. The plaintiff purchased the property in 1934. The defendant was then the tenant in occupation, paying a rent of either 7s. 9d. or 6s. 11d. a week. In 1935 the plaintiff successfully applied under the current rent restriction legislation to have it declared that the house was free from the control of that legislation. Thereupon the plaintiff informed the defendant that the rent for the premises would thenceforth be at the rate of 10s. 6d. per week. There ensued a correspondence, the substance of which was that the defendant denied, I assume wrongly, the right of the plaintiff to increase the rent. That matter, however, is irrelevant. The vital fact is that on May 28, 1938, the defendant made his last payment to the plaintiff in respect of rent. Since that date he has paid no rent to the plaintiff, nor has he made any acknowledgement whatever of the plaintiff's title as his landlord. One other circumstance must be mentioned, for it is that on which the whole argument of the plaintiff in this court has rested. As a result of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, on Sept. 2 of that year, these premises were again brought within the ambit of the rent restriction legislation so that thenceforward any tenant of the premises under a letting to which the Acts applied would be entitled to the protection of those Acts. A B

I can dispose in brief terms of two subsidiary points that emerged during the hearing, either in this court or below. In the first place, it was suggested and argued in the court below (but in this court counsel for the plaintiff only faintly adumbrated it) that there was here a lease in writing so as to exclude the particular provisions of s. 9 (2) of the Limitation Act, 1939. The alleged lease in writing consisted of the rent book, which was put in evidence. The judge rejected the view that the rent book was such a lease in writing within the meaning of the Act, and I think he was right in that conclusion. The rent book is what it purports to be, and what it is called, a rent book, that is, a book containing acknowledgements of the payment of weekly sums of rent, and containing also, in pursuance of the terms of the legislation, a reference to the terms on which the tenant was holding his tenancy. On the face of it, it was not intended to be, and is not, a contract for granting a tenancy, still less a lease creating an estate. It is at most a book evidencing the terms on which the tenant held. C D

The second matter was this. It was argued in the court below that since the defendant was admittedly the tenant of the plaintiff up to the time when he ceased to pay rent, therefore, all his subsequent occupation, albeit without any payment of rent or other acknowledgement, was referable to his having been a tenant of the plaintiff, so that at no stage was he ever in adverse possession of the premises. That point was expressly abandoned by counsel for the plaintiff in this court, and, therefore, I do not spend further time on it, for it is now conceded by him that from the expiration of one week after May 28, 1938 (that is, after the last payment of rent) until the impact on these premises of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, there was adverse possession on the part of the tenant within the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1939. The argument is that, when, on Sept. 2, 1939, the premises were again brought within the scope of the rent restriction legislation, then, by reason of the terms and the effect of that legislation, the adverse possession of the defendant ceased because thenceforward, by virtue of the Acts, the plaintiff had no right as of course to recover possession against the defendant, the tenant. The most that she had, according to the argument, was the right to go to the county court and invoke the exercise in her favour of the discretion vested in the county court judge to grant possession, if he thought it reasonable in all the circumstances so to do. That qualified right, it is said, is not such as is consistent with adverse possession on the part of the defendant. E F G H

Such a view, if it were well founded, would be somewhat startling, for it would necessarily follow that in the case of premises within the Rent Restrictions Acts, unless the statutory period under the Limitation Act, 1939, had expired before they came within the Acts, the Limitation Act could never run in favour of the tenant so long as the Rent Acts remained on the statute book. A further reason for thinking such a conclusion surprising is that the rent restriction legislation is intended to protect tenants, but, if counsel for the plaintiff is right, in this instance it would have the effect of preserving to the landlord a right in respect of this property which indubitably otherwise she would have lost.

Section 4 (3) of the Limitation Act, 1939, provides:

- A "No action shall be brought by any . . . person to recover any land after the expiration of twelve years from the date on which the right of action accrued to him . . . "

I turn to s. 9 to see when, in such a case as this, where the parties originally were in the relationship of landlord and tenant, the right of action accrued to the landlord. That appears from s. 9 (2):

- B "A tenancy from year to year or other period, without a lease in writing, shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be determined at the expiration of the first year or other period, and accordingly the right of action of the person entitled to the land subject to the tenancy shall be deemed to have accrued at the date of such determination: Provided that, where any rent has subsequently been received in respect of the tenancy, the right of action shall be deemed to have accrued on the date of the last receipt of rent."
- C

It is from s. 9 (2) that I derive the conclusion that the right of action, subject to what follows in s. 10, accrued to the plaintiff at the latest at the expiration of the week following May 28, 1938, when the last payment of rent was made. The conclusion which I have stated is subject to s. 10 which provides:

- D "(1) No right of action to recover land shall be deemed to accrue unless the land is in the possession of some person in whose favour the period of limitation can run (hereafter in this section referred to as 'adverse possession') and where under the foregoing provisions of this Act any such right of action is deemed to accrue on a certain date and no person is in adverse possession on that date, the right of action shall not be deemed to accrue unless and until adverse possession is taken of the land. (2) Where a right of action to recover land has accrued and thereafter, before the right is barred, the land ceases to be in adverse possession, the right of action shall no longer be deemed to have accrued and no fresh right of action shall be deemed to accrue unless and until the land is again taken into adverse possession."
- E

- F Section 16 provides that when the period prescribed by the Act for any person to bring an action to recover land has expired the title of the person dispossessed is extinguished. Finally, in the definition section, s. 31, there is found:

"'Action' includes any proceeding in a court of law, including an ecclesiastical court."

- G Reverting to s. 10, it is on the second sub-section that the argument of counsel for the plaintiff rests, for it is said that, while he concedes that the right of action did accrue on the date in 1938 which I have mentioned, nevertheless, by virtue of the rent restriction legislation which became applicable to the premises in September, 1939, thenceforward there ceased to be adverse possession on the part of the defendant. It will follow from the passages which I have read from the Limitation Act, 1939, that for the limitation period to run and extinguish the title of the plaintiff, two conditions must be satisfied—(i) that a right of action accrued at a date (in this case) not less than twelve years before the proceedings, and (ii) that thereafter throughout the intervening period there has been adverse possession by the person in occupation. Counsel for the plaintiff has conceded not only that the right of action accrued in June, 1938, but also that until Sept. 1, 1939, there was adverse possession on the part of the defendant. As a matter of principle, it seems to me, prima facie, reasonably clear that, if the nature of the possession of the defendant was adverse from June, 1938, to September, 1939, its quality cannot have been altered by the impact of another Act of Parliament designed to give protection to tenants against eviction by their landlords, but having nothing to do with the purpose and scope of the Limitation Act, 1939.
- H

I think that the fallacy of the argument of counsel for the plaintiff lies in the assumption that adverse possession postulates in the other party an unqualified right to recover possession throughout the period alleged. I do not find in the section any language to justify that conclusion. In s. 10 (1) that which is defined as "adverse possession" is "land in the possession of some person in whose favour the period of limitation can run". According to the ordinary sense of the words, adverse possession must, I should have thought, be possession adverse to—that is to say, inconsistent with and in denial of—the right of the landlord to the premises, and if, as is conceded during the period from June, 1938, to September, 1939, the occupation of the defendant without payment of rent and without acknowledgment constituted such possession adverse to, and in denial of, the plaintiff's title, I cannot see how it can be said that that situation is altered by the limitations placed by Parliament on the right of a landlord to recover possession of controlled premises under the legislation which then came into operation.

The matter may be tested in this way. Counsel for the defendant referred to Re Jolly (1), where COLLINS, L.J., used this language with reference to the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 ([1900] 2 Ch. 619):

"At the end of the twelve years the possession of a tenant who has paid no rent becomes adverse during the whole time the adverse possession is validated by the statute, and it is not competent for the landlord to say that he still retains the right to recover rent which was not payable to him. I think that is emphasised by the position of a tenant under a lease for years as compared with that of a tenant under a lease from year to year. In the former case the non-payment of rent does not render the possession of the tenant adverse unless he pays rent to some person other than the lessor. But in the latter case the legislature has treated the mere non-payment of rent by a tenant from year to year as a payment to some person other than the landlord."

I test the matter by supposing that in this case the defendant had paid the rent, 7s. 9d. or 10s. 6d., or whatever it might be, to some person other than the plaintiff, either in the false belief that that other person was the landlord or else with the deliberate intention of creating a statutory title in favour of that other person and in defeasance of the plaintiff's right. In those circumstances it seems to me extravagant to suggest that payment over this period of rent to some other person was not possession adverse to the plaintiff. The only distinction here is that the defendant did not pay rent to anyone. That fact cannot avail the plaintiff since it is conceded on her behalf that, apart from the Rent Restrictions Acts, non-payment of any rent and the absence of any other acknowledgment, is, under the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1939, possession adverse to the person to whom the rent should have been paid.

The notion of adverse possession, which is enshrined now in s. 10 of the Act of 1909, is not new. The section is an enactment of the law in regard to the matter as it had been laid down by the courts in interpreting the earlier limitation statutes. I am content to make one reference to PRESTON AND NEWSOM'S LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, 2nd ed., p. 71:

"A right of action only accrues, and time only runs, if and so long as there is a person in possession and that person is not disqualified from relying on the statute. Thus, by s. 19, a trustee cannot avail himself of the statute against his beneficiary as the trustee's possession is not adverse. Again, a beneficiary in possession does not have possession adverse to the trustees or his co-beneficiaries . . . possession may fail to be adverse by reason of the rule that 'possession is never adverse if it can be referred to a lawful title'."

A If the argument was capable of being sustained that a tenant retaining possession without paying rent or making other acknowledgment was still in possession by virtue of a title referable to his tenancy, the rest of the argument would be logical. In the absence of that being established, it follows necessarily that a tenant in the circumstances of this defendant, apart from the Rent Acts, is in adverse possession within the meaning of s. 10, and it seems to me that the Rent Acts have no bearing on the question we have to decide—whether in this case the conditions of the Limitation Act, 1939, are satisfied.

B I would be content to leave it there, but out of respect to the argument of counsel for the plaintiff I will add a few sentences in reference to the proper place which the Rent Acts have in such a case as this. First, however, I refer to one passage from Warren v. Murray (2), to which counsel for the plaintiff referred us. That was a case in which a person was in occupation under a contract to grant him a lease for ninety-nine years, such lease never having been granted. In the absence of the lease he was, in the eye of the law, only a tenant at will, and that tenancy could have been determined at any time and the owner could have recovered possession. Having regard to the existence of the contract, it was pointed out that a court of equity would, if asked, grant an injunction to restrain the owner exercising his legal rights, so that the effect was that the landlord had no right to go to the court and demand possession, and, therefore, it was said that no right of action had ever accrued. In his judgment, A. L. SMITH, D L.J., said ([1894] 2 Q.B. 658):

E "It seems to me evident that a person must have an effective right to make entry and to recover possession of the land in order that the statute may begin to run. If the argument for the plaintiff is correct, the trustees are to lose their property because they did not enter at a time when they really could not enter with any effect, inasmuch as a court of equity would at once have decreed specific performance and put an end to any entry they might have made. It seems to me impossible to hold that this constitutes an entry within the meaning of the Act. It is, however, said that the plaintiff's predecessors became tenants at will, and by virtue of s. 7 the statute began to run a year after they were let into possession. I do not so read the section. As in the case of s. 2, it seems to me that s. 7 requires that there should have been an effective right of entry or action before the section can apply at all. It provides at what time the right of entry or action shall be deemed to have accrued, but that assumes that there is a 'right' of entry or action. In this case there was no such right, and therefore the statute did not run."

G Those words were used at a time when such matters as rent restriction legislation were not in contemplation, but, in any event, they have no bearing on the present problem. The question there was not whether there was adverse possession, but whether a right of action had ever accrued. In the present case it is admitted that it did, and the only question is whether adverse possession thereafter continued. None of the authorities cited by counsel for the plaintiff is, in my judgment, authority for the proposition that the test of adverse H possession is, as he would have it, the existence of an absolute unqualified right to recover possession in the courts on the part of the owner of the property. We are not concerned with what the situation would have been if at the time the statutory period of limitation was alleged to begin to run the premises had been under the control of the Rent Acts so that the only right the landlord would then have had would have been the right to invoke the jurisdiction of the county court. If such were the circumstances, the question, no doubt, would arise whether there was a right of action within the meaning of s. 4 (3) and s. 9 of the Limitation Act, 1939, by virtue of the qualifications put on that right by the rent restriction legislation. We have not to decide that question, but I must not be taken in any way to indicate the view that, if such were the facts, the right of action within the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1939, would not arise because of the qualifications imposed on a landlord by the Rent Restrictions Acts.

Under the definition of "action", which I have read, a right of action includes a right of proceeding in any court. If, by virtue of the non-payment of rent or some other denial of the landlord's rights, a landlord becomes entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of the court, it seems, prima facie, though I express no final view on the matter because it is unnecessary, that the "right of action" within the meaning of the Limitation Act, 1939, would cover a right to go to the county court and invoke the county court's jurisdiction. I must also not be taken to suggest that in a case such as the present, if after, say, nine or ten years of occupation on the part of a tenant without paying rent, without any acknowledgment of the landlord's title, and in denial of any rights on the part of the landlord, a landlord tries to recover possession, the defence on the Rent Restrictions Acts would be open to the tenant, or that he could, in such circumstances, successfully contend that the dwelling-house was a dwelling-house subject to a letting within the meaning of the Rent Act. That, again, it is unnecessary to decide, but assuming that as a practical matter, and certainly it would be a correct assumption if proceedings were taken shortly after the occupant ceased to pay rent, it would be necessary to satisfy a court that it was reasonable to make an order, still it does not seem to me that that consideration assists the defendant in the present case.

Possession, for the purposes of the Limitation Act, 1939, is none the less adverse because Parliament has thought fit to put certain serious qualifications on the right of a person whose land is in adverse possession to enter and to recover the possession of that property. After all, in order that the occupant may invoke the Rent Acts he must assert a tenancy, either a contractual tenancy or a statutory tenancy, and it obviously would not lie easily in the mouth of a defendant to assert a contractual tenancy if for years and years he has paid no regard whatever to any of the terms of the contract he alleges. The same, I think, would apply to a statutory tenancy, seeing that by s. 15 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, conditions of the statutory tenancy are defined thus:

"A tenant who by virtue of the provisions of this Act retains possession of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies shall, so long as he retains possession, observe and be entitled to the benefit of all the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy . . ."

An occupant who observes none of the terms and conditions of the original contract of tenancy, prima facie, would be in difficulty in asserting that he was a statutory tenant.

It is, however, unnecessary to pursue this matter further. For the reasons I have indicated, I think that, undoubtedly, there was here the accrual of a right of action in June, 1938. So much is admitted. I think it equally clear that there was then adverse possession on the part of the tenant, the defendant, and I cannot see anything in the impact of the Rent Acts or otherwise which qualified or altered the character of the possession which had begun as adverse possession. I, therefore, think that the judge rightly concluded the matter in favour of the defendant, and I would dismiss the appeal.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. Counsel for the plaintiff has argued that, even if there were adverse possession in June, 1938, and it extended until September, 1939, nevertheless, when the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, came into force, all was cured inasmuch as after that date there could not be adverse possession. In support of that argument he said that the test of adverse possession was the right of the landlord to recover possession, which he could not do after the passing of the Act of 1939. My Lord has discussed the test of adverse possession, and it is enough for me to say that I fully agree with the reasons given by him for saying that the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, are irrelevant to this case.

- ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. The defendant's former tenancy was plainly
- A an oral weekly tenancy, although it was rather faintly sought to be argued that it was a lease in writing, but my Lord has disposed of that in language with which I entirely agree. The tenancy being a weekly tenancy, time started to run by virtue of s. 9 of the Limitation Act, 1939, after the expiration of one week from the date of the last payment of rent, which was on May 28, 1938. As no notice to quit was given, the tenant could not thereafter be said to be in immediate
- B adverse possession in the ordinary sense, for he remained on under his contractual tenancy. Nevertheless, for the purposes of the Limitation Act, his tenancy ceased to exist, and, therefore, he is deemed to have remained on in adverse possession. Accordingly, the fact that for some purposes his contractual right remained in the absence of a notice to quit or a writ for possession is irrelevant, as also is the precise date on which the lessor could properly have started proceedings in ejectment.
- C The point is that from the date which I have mentioned the defendant is deemed to have had no contractual right to possession, and, therefore, to have been a trespasser or a squatter. Why should he be regarded as being in possession by virtue of permission or grant of the owner merely because of the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939? That Act gave him no contractual right to possession; it created no contractual tenancy. By reason
- D of the Act the lessor could not eject him without an order of the county court, but that is merely a barrier in the way of the lessor's right of action for possession, and it conferred no title on the lessee so as to convert what was formerly deemed to be adverse possession into permissive possession or possession as of right.

- The cases cited to us, for example, Warren v. Murray (2), do not, in my opinion, assist the plaintiff's claim, because in those cases the owner could not evict the occupier in question inasmuch as the latter had some legal or equitable right derived from the owner entitling him to remain in occupation. Counsel for the plaintiff argued before us that the test of adverse possession is whether the owner has an unqualified right to sue for possession, and, if he has not that right, the occupation cannot be regarded as adverse. The fact that in the cases this has been in some sense treated as the test does not render the test exhaustive,
- F because usually the two things are co-extensive, that is to say, if the owner has given a contractual right or permission to occupy, he cannot bring an action for eviction, and vice versa.

- It seems to me that one can, in addition to looking at the position and rights of the owner, legitimately look also at the position of the occupier for the purpose of seeing whether his occupation is adverse. In my opinion, if one looks to the
- G position of the occupier and finds that his right to occupation is derived from the owner in the form of permission or agreement or grant, it is not adverse, but, if it is not so derived, it is adverse, even if the owner is, by legislation, prevented from bringing ejectment proceedings. In the present case, for the purposes of the Limitation Act, 1939, the defendant had no such derivative right from the plaintiff between June 4, 1938, and Sept. 1, 1939, and he acquired no such
- H right on the latter date, because the statutory protection afforded by the Act did not constitute a title referable to or emerging from the owner. So far as the owner is concerned, it in fact conferred no title to possession at all; it merely provided in some degree a defence to a claim for possession. For these reasons, which are in effect substantially the same as those which my Lord has given, I agree that this appeal fails. Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: David Morris (for the plaintiff); Piper, Smith & Piper (for the defendant).
[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

L. D. TURNER, LTD. v. R. S. HATTON (BRADFORD), LTD.

[LEEDS ASSIZES (Hallett, J.), February 21, 22, 1952.]

Sale of Goods—Note or memorandum in writing—Particulars of transaction in document not signed by party to be charged—Letter signed by that party to third person referring to transaction—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (c. 71), s. 4 (1).

The defendants having orally agreed to sell to the plaintiffs twenty-five tons of carpet thrums, the plaintiffs sent to the defendants a document, dated May 18, 1950, entitled "Confirmation of purchase" and containing all the material terms of the agreement. The defendants gave the plaintiffs no acknowledgment in writing of this document, but in a letter to their suppliers, dated May 22, 1950, and signed by them, they said: "If you would send a few tons at a time per rail it will be out of your way . . . as we have booked twenty-five tons with our customer".

HELD: on the evidence the letter of May 22 referred to the sale mentioned in the document of May 18; it supplied a recognition over the signature of the defendants of the transaction of which particulars were recorded in that document; and, therefore, the documents constituted a sufficient memorandum of the contract of sale within the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 4 (1).

Observations of RUSSELL, J., in Stokes v. Whicher ([1920] 1 Ch. 418), applied.

AS TO THE MEMORANDUM IN GENERAL, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 29, pp. 33-37, paras. 34-38; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 39, pp. 383-389, Nos. 212-250, and Digest Supps.

Cases referred to:

(1) Gibson v. Holland, (1865), L.R. 1 C.P. 1; 35 L.J.C.P. 5; 13 L.T. 293; 39 Digest 383, 212.

(2) Cave v. Hastings, (1881), 7 Q.B.D. 125; 50 L.J.Q.B. 575; 45 L.T. 348; 46 J.P. 56; 12 Digest, Replacement, 159, 1022.

(3) Ridgway v. Wharton, (1857), 6 H.L. Cas. 238; 27 L.J.Ch. 46; 29 L.T.O.S. 390; 10 E.R. 1287; 39 Digest 386, 234.

(4) Long v. Millar, (1879), 4 C.P.D. 450; 48 L.J.Q.B. 596; 41 L.T. 306; 43 J.P. 797; 12 Digest, Replacement, 158, 1017.

(5) Burgess v. Cox, [1950] 2 All E.R. 1212; [1951] Ch. 383; 2nd Digest Supp.

(6) Fowler v. Bratt, [1950] 1 All E.R. 662; [1950] 2 K.B. 96; 2nd Digest Supp.

(7) Stokes v. Whicher, [1920] 1 Ch. 411; 89 L.J.Ch. 198; 123 L.T. 23; 12 Digest 159, 1028.

ACTION by the plaintiffs for damages for non-delivery of the balance of goods under three contracts. As regards the third contract the defendants pleaded (inter alia) that it was not enforceable as the requirements of s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, had not been complied with.

R. Lyons for the plaintiffs.

Hinchcliffe, Q.C., and McKee for the defendants.

HALLETT, J.: In this case the plaintiffs claim damages for non-delivery from the defendants. At the material time both the plaintiffs and the defendants were minded to deal in what are called carpet thrums, which is the waste wool resulting from the manufacture of carpets. There were, admittedly, two previous contracts made between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the sale and delivery of five tons of carpet thrums and ten tons of carpet thrums respectively, and as regards them no question arises, save that on the second contract there was short delivery to the extent of slightly over one ton. The dispute arises on a third contract which, according to the plaintiffs, was made between them and the defendants for the sale and delivery by the defendants to the plaintiffs of a further twenty-five tons of carpet thrums, deliverable by equal monthly deliveries of five tons over the last five months of 1950. It is common ground that not a single ounce of that twenty-five tons has ever been delivered, and the total damages payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs (including a sum in respect of the second contract) have now been agreed at £9,484 7s. 4d.

Two points fall to be decided. First, the plaintiffs affirm and the defendants deny that there ever was the contract for twenty-five tons which I have mentioned. That is a pure question of fact. The other point, which arises only if on the first point I am in favour of the plaintiffs, is connected with s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The practice of the plaintiffs has been, when they have made a purchase, to send to the sellers a printed form, headed "Confirmation of Purchase No.—" and stating "L. D. Turner, Ltd. to Messrs." (in this case "R. S. Hatton, Bradford.") "We beg to confirm our purchase from you this day as follows". Then there is "Description," "Quantity," "Price," and in certain cases provisions as to delivery and also a reference to terms, and that is signed on behalf of the plaintiffs by Mr. Turner. Part of the sheet at the bottom is a slip, separated by perforation from the rest of the page, which can be torn off, and that part of the document is addressed to the plaintiffs and states: "We acknowledge receipt of your contract No.—and agree that the details are correct". That is intended to be signed by the sellers.

As regards the first and second contracts, the acknowledgment part of the form was completed and signed by the defendants. As regards the third contract the plaintiffs sent to the defendants an exactly similar form dated May 18, 1950, the purchase number being 807, but the defendants did not complete the acknowledgment slip and the result is that that form bears no signature of the defendants or of an agent on their behalf. If it had been signed, there is no doubt it would have provided a perfect memorandum of the alleged contract. In a good many of the cases to which I have been referred by counsel the court has been faced with the problem whether the memorandum alleged to be found in one, two, three, or some other number of documents is an adequate memorandum, that is to say, whether it has recorded those essential particulars which have to be recorded to form a memorandum in accordance with the requirements of s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, or the corresponding section of the Law of Property Act, 1925—s. 40 (1)—but no such question arises here because here this is unquestionably an adequate memorandum of the transaction. The only difficulty from the point of view of the plaintiffs is that it is not signed by the defendants, and, if they are to satisfy the requirements of the section, they must import into this memorandum a signature by the defendants from somewhere else. I am quite clear that, unless the plaintiffs can get what they want from a letter dated May 22, 1950, they cannot get it at all and the defence raised under s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act must succeed.

With regard to the first point, I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiffs did enter into a verbal contract with the defendants whereby the defendants undertook to supply these twenty-five tons in accordance with the terms recorded on the document dated May 18, 1950. The letter of May 22, 1950, is from the defendants to a Mr. Wiseman of Glasgow, who from time to time supplied them with waste wool for re-sale, and it is as follows:

"We should, however, be pleased if you would let us have as much weight as you possibly can this coming month. If you would send a few tons at a time per rail it will be out of your way and will at the same time lighten our worry, as we have booked twenty-five tons with our customer."

Mr. Hatton, when cross-examined, admitted that on his story that there was no contract for the twenty-five tons with the plaintiffs that statement was a lie. He said it was a politic lie told in order to try to get from Mr. Wiseman the wool that was necessary to satisfy the plaintiffs' requirements.

Now I come to the second question—whether a sufficient signature can be got out of the letter. I have been referred to a number of cases, but, I think, it is common ground that none of those is exactly in point, and, indeed, I have a feeling that in what I am proposing to decide I am possibly widening still further the gap in the cover afforded by s. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. It has sometimes been suggested that a coach and horses has been driven through the section. I hope it will not be suggested that I have driven a six-wheeled articulated lorry through it. I have already pointed out that cases where difficulty has been created by the adequacy of the memorandum are clearly distinguishable. The first point to which I have addressed my mind is this. The letter is not addressed to the plaintiffs. It is addressed by the defendants to Mr. Wiseman, a third person. As regards that, I think there is adequate authority that, if in other respects a document is sufficient and satisfactory, it makes no difference that it is addressed to a third party by the party to be charged. The first authority for that in point of time, so far as I am aware, is Gibson v. Holland (1). In that case a letter, signed by the party to be charged, was written to that party's own agent—on the facts very different from the present case where the letter signed by the party to be charged is written to his supplier—but I can see no difference in principle as regards that. ERLE, C.J., said (L.R. 1 C.P. 5):

“Now, a note or memorandum is equally corroborative, whether it passes between the parties to the contract themselves, or between one of them and his own agent. Indeed, one would incline to think that a statement made by the party to his own agent would be the more satisfactory evidence of the two.”

The reasoning of those few words seems to me to be that a statement made by a party to his supplier cannot be of less value than a statement made to the opposite party to the alleged contract, namely, in this case the plaintiffs.

The next question which arises is much more difficult. At one time, undoubtedly, it seems to have been thought that the statement signed must contain an actual reference to the document said to have recorded the terms, but, to my mind, one must be careful how far one allows oneself to pay attention to some of the earlier cases. The view the law takes develops from time to time. I think the only safe thing to do in the year 1952 is to look at the latest authorities where the material points have been reviewed. In particular, there are two cases in 1950 from which, I think, I can safely derive guidance.

Before dealing with those cases I will refer to Cave v. Hastings (2) where the defendant in a letter to the plaintiff, signed by the defendant, referred to “our arrangement for the hire of your carriage”. There was no other arrangement for the hire of a carriage than that the terms of which were contained in a memorandum signed by the plaintiff, and it was held that the defendant's letter sufficiently referred to the document containing the terms of the contract to constitute a good memorandum of the contract within the Statute of Frauds, s. 4. It will be observed that the word “arrangement” in itself can, as it seems to me, perfectly well refer either to a verbal arrangement or to a written arrangement or to a verbal arrangement recorded in a written document. In Ridgway v. Wharton (3), the material word was “instructions”, and, again, I should have thought that “instructions” may refer obviously to something that is verbal or to something that is written, and other examples can be found mentioned in the text-books, for instance, in BENJAMIN ON SALE, 8th ed., at p. 238, note (g), there are some examples given, including Ridgway v. Wharton (3), Cave v. Hastings (2) and also Long v. Millar (4).

The two latest cases from which, however, I propose to derive assistance are a decision of HARMAN, J., in Burgess v. Cox (5) and a decision in the Court of Appeal in Fowler v. Bratt (6). In the latter case, two members of the court, DENNING, L.J., and JENKINS, L.J., do not discuss the point with which I am now concerned, there being other grounds on which that particular case turned, but SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., did discuss it. He said:

"The general principle is thus stated, I think accurately, in WILLIAMS ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER (4th ed.), vol. 1, pp. 20 and 21 . . ."

and he read the passage, and continued:

" . . . at p. 7, the learned authors had discussed the older and stricter rule that if two documents were to be read together, they must in terms be the one connected to the other; but that, I think, is plainly not now the law. I think that clearly emerges from Long v. Millar (4) which was analysed by RUSSELL, J., in Stokes v. Whicher (7). I think that the observations in Long v. Millar (4) are indeed most pertinent to this case . . . 'Long v. Millar (4)' said RUSSELL, J. 'comes to this: that, if you can spell out of the document a reference in it to some other transaction, you are at liberty to give evidence as to what that other transaction is, and, if that other transaction contains all the terms in writing, then you get a sufficient memorandum within the statute by reading the two together.' Applying those principles, I am clearly of opinion that we can, and must read together the letters of Nov. 20 and 23."

So it is quite clear that the Master of the Rolls is accepting the words of RUSSELL, J., as correctly summarising the law. I have mentioned the judgment of HARMAN, J., in Burgess v. Cox (5), but, I think, I need say no more about it than that what HARMAN, J., appears in his judgment to have thought to have been the present state of the law is that which I am proposing to apply.

Applying those principles to the present case, can I spell out of the letter of May 22, 1950, a reference to some other transaction? I most certainly can. Having heard the evidence and taking the view which I do as to the making of the contract on May 18, I have not the slightest doubt that when the defendants used the expression "as we have booked twenty-five tons with our customer" they were referring to the transaction of sale of the twenty-five tons to the plaintiffs which is recorded in the document dated May 18. I reserved my view until I found whether there was any other possible explanation of those words. Conceivably there may have been some twenty-five tons of some different goods sold to some customer other than the plaintiffs, and, if there were some other transaction to which those words might apply, the position might be different, but it is not suggested that there is. There cannot be the slightest doubt about it that those words apply to the transaction now in question, and, indeed, even Mr. Hatton in his explanation of those words, while saying they state a lie, agrees that they refer to the negotiations, though he will not admit the obligations, into which he had entered with the plaintiffs. I spell out of the document a reference to the transaction of the sale of the twenty-five tons, and, indeed, I think the words "spell out" are rather understating it. I think it is a clear reference to it and nothing else. Then, said RUSSELL, J., in Stokes v. Whicher (7): "You are at liberty to give evidence as to what that other transaction is". I have had the evidence, and, to my mind, it abundantly establishes that the other transaction there referred to is the transaction I have already defined. "And, if", the passage goes on, "that other transaction contains all the terms in writing, then you get a sufficient memorandum within the statute by reading the two together". The other transaction did contain all the terms in writing. Here it is, as I have said, not merely adequate, but apart from the absence of signature a perfect memorandum of the other transaction. Therefore, applying the principles which RUSSELL, J., found in Stokes v. Whicher (7), and which SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., thought it right to apply in Fowler v. Bratt (6) I have come to the conclusion that the letter of May 22, 1950, does supply that which is wanted, namely, a recognition over the signature of the defendants of the transaction of which particulars are recorded in the document of May 18. There is a signed recognition, to my mind, of the transaction of which the particulars have been adequately recorded to satisfy the requirements of the statute. As I have already said quite candidly, I do not think any case cited to me exactly covers this case as regards the facts, but, applying the principles which seem to me to be recognised in the authorities, I am led to the conclusion to which I have arrived, namely, that here there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors: A. V. Hammond & Co., Bradford (for the plaintiffs); Cawthron, Priddin & Read, Bradford (for the defendants).

[Reported by G. M. SMAILES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NEWSOM v. ROBERTSON (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), April 29, 30, 1952.]

Income Tax—Deduction against profits—Travelling expenses—Barrister travelling between chambers and home where he did part of his professional work—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (a).

The taxpayer carried on the profession of barrister at chambers in London. At his home outside London he used a study for the purpose of doing work which he took home in the evenings and at week-ends. During vacations he seldom came to London, but did the greater part of his work at home. In computing the profits of his profession for assessment to income tax, he claimed deduction of the expenses which he incurred in travelling between his home and his chambers.

HELD: (i) on the evidence the taxpayer carried on his profession both at his chambers and at his home; he travelled between those two places, not merely, for the purpose of carrying on his profession, but also because one of those places was his home where he had chosen to live; and, therefore, the travelling expenses, during both term and vacation, were not incurred wholly and exclusively for the purposes of his profession, within r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918.

(ii) in any case the difficulty of splitting the expenses between the amount referable to professional purposes and the amount referable to other purposes precluded any apportionment.

AS TO DEDUCTIONS IN RESPECT OF TRAVELLING EXPENSES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 17, p. 221, para. 446; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 28, p. 89, Nos. 520-523.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland, Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1948] 2 All E.R. 367; [1948] A.C. 508; [1948] L.J.R. 1557; 30 Tax Cas. 267; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Norman v. Golder, [1945] 1 All E.R. 352; 114 L.J.K.B. 108; 171 L.T. 369; 26 Tax Cas. 293; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Spofforth & Prince v. Golder, [1945] 1 All E.R. 363; 173 L.T. 77; 26 Tax Cas. 310; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Von Glehn, [1920] 2 K.B. 553; 89 L.J.K.B. 590; 123 L.T. 338; 28 Digest 46, 236.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

In computing the profits of his profession of barrister for assessment to income tax, the taxpayer claimed to deduct the expenses of travelling between his home, where he carried on part of his professional work, and his chambers. The Special Commissioners found that he exercised his profession partly at his chambers and partly at his home. They held that the travelling expenses incurred during term time were not money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of his profession, within the meaning of r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, but that during vacation the base of his operations was changed to his home, so that travelling expenses then incurred were allowable. The taxpayer appealed against the disallowance of expenses incurred during term, and the Crown appealed against the allowance of expenses incurred during vacation.

Millard Tucker, Q.C., J. W. P. Clements and Abel-Smith for the taxpayer.
Heyworth Talbot, Q.C., and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

A

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is an appeal by a barrister, practising at the Chancery Bar, against an assessment to income tax under Case II of sched. D, which is the Case under which professional earnings are taxed for the purpose of income tax under the Income Tax Act, 1918. There is also a cross-appeal by the Crown in respect of an allowance which was made by the Special Commissioners to this taxpayer in respect of a certain period of his activities.

B

Rule 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, seems to me the only rule which is material in the present case. I was referred by counsel for the taxpayer also to r. 9 of sched. E, which applies in the case of persons who are assessed under sched. E as holding offices and employments and the like—a rule which, as is well known, is much more limited and severe as regards allowances of expenses than the rules applicable in the case of sched. D assessments, but, in my view, that rule is wholly immaterial for the present purposes.

C

Rule 3 is as follows:

D

“In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of (a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, profession, employment, or vocation: (b) any disbursements or expenses of maintenance of the parties, their families or establishments or any sums expended for any other domestic or private purposes distinct from the purposes of such trade, profession, employment or vocation.”

E

The facts in the present case have been found in considerable detail by the Special Commissioners, but I do not propose to go through the whole of them in detail. Substantially, the point is to be found in para. 3 of the Case where it is said that the taxpayer exercises his profession as a barrister partly at his chambers (15 Old Square) and partly at his home (the Old Rectory, Whipsnade), “as hereinafter more particularly described”. It is said in the Case that at his home he has a study which is a large room occupying about one-eighth of the house where he keeps a set of law reports and a number of legal text-books. He receives from the Inland Revenue, for income tax purposes, a “study allowance” under r. 3 (c) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, being a proportionate part of the rates and the annual value of the entire house together with a sum in respect of the cost of lighting, cleaning and heating the study. As a member of the Bar during term time, the taxpayer carries on the greater part of his work at his chambers at 15 Old Square. On the other hand, he has the law reports and other facilities at his house, and when he comes back to his house at night after dinner he continues to do a considerable amount of work there. During the week-end and in the day time he also does work at his house. In the vacation he seldom goes to his chambers, but, it would appear, does his work for the most part—and he has to do quite a lot of work in the vacation—at his house. Sometimes he has engagements which are not in London, and to those places where the engagements are he would appear very often to go from Whipsnade rather than from his chambers at 15 Old Square, Lincoln's Inn.

F

G

H

In a sense the Special Commissioners reached two conclusions. They found that the expenses of travelling between Whipsnade and London during term time were not expenses “wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes” of the taxpayer's profession, and, therefore, they disallowed that portion of the expenses claimed which related to that period of the year. On the other hand, they thought that during the vacation the base of the operations of the taxpayer was changed to Whipsnade and they did allow expenses (which, of course, were a very small amount), in respect to the period of the vacation. Both parties are dissatisfied with the conclusion reached by the Special Commissioners. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that, in dividing the matter in this way, the Special Commissioners have come to a wrong conclusion. I think they have either misdirected themselves, or have reached a conclusion which is not supported by any evidence.

It seems to me that one must take the position throughout the period of assessment as a whole, and it is not right to split up the activities of the taxpayer into two bases, 15 Old Square in term time, and the Old Rectory, Whipsnade, in the vacation. It appears to me that the right way is to look at the expenses and to consider what is the purpose of the journeys in respect of which they are incurred throughout the period in question. One is a little startled to find, after so many years in which the Income Tax Acts have been in operation, that there is a claim of this kind made which, so far as I know, has not been put forward or allowed on a previous occasion. It seems to me, in some respects, a novel claim. The basis of the taxpayer's case is this. As found by the commissioners, he has two places of business. He practises his profession not only at 15 Old Square, but also at the Old Rectory, Whipsnade. The commissioners have found, says counsel for the taxpayer, that it is just the same as where a barrister may have two sets of chambers and would be entitled to be allowed the expenses in moving from one set of chambers to the other set of chambers. But that does not seem to me to be the right way to look at this case. It is, perhaps, a matter of first impression, but it is really a case, I think, in which the travelling in question is done for a dual purpose. As counsel for the taxpayer has said, that does not necessarily involve a disallowance of the whole of the expenses if they could be split, but, admittedly, it would be very difficult to split the expenses of travelling between the amount which is referable to professional purposes and the amount which is referable to other purposes in such a case as this. I think that is really the answer to the point on the question of splitting.

There are a number of cases to which I have been referred as illustrations in which it has been found that the expenditure was incurred by the taxpayer for more than one purpose—a commercial purpose in the sense that it was incurred for the purpose of earning the profits of the trade and also some outside purpose different from that—and the decisions of the courts have been that the expenses could not be claimed at all for the simple reason that they were not “wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, profession, employment, or vocation.” The cases in question are Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland, Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1); Norman v. Golder (2); Spofforth & Prince v. Golder (3), and Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Von Glehn (4). In my view, the result of the facts, as I see them, which have been found by the commissioners in the present case, is this. It is true that the taxpayer carries on his profession at two places, but he travels between those two places not simply for the purposes of carrying on his profession, but also because his home, as the commissioners have found, is at the Old Rectory, Whipsnade. He travels backwards and forwards between his home and his chambers in 15 Old Square, because he has to live somewhere and because he wishes to go backwards and forwards between his chambers and his home. It does not seem to me that it makes any substantial difference that he also carries on his profession and does a lot of work at a place which happens to be his home. His motive, his object, and his purpose in travelling between these places, as it seems to me, are mixed. I feel considerable sympathy over a claim of this kind as, indeed, with a claim by anybody to be allowed the expenses which he necessarily has to incur to get to his place of business from his home, whether he actually works at his home or not. The days have long gone by, if they ever really existed, when a person lived over his shop or at his place of business. At the present time, a person is more or less tied to the particular place where he resides, because, under present housing and living conditions, it is not possible to alter one's residence at will. But there is the element in this case that the taxpayer has chosen to live at Whipsnade because he likes living in the country and enjoying the amenities which living at that place confers on him. Therefore, it seems to me that his expenditure on travelling between Whipsnade and Lincoln's Inn is due partly to the calls of his profession, but also partly to the requirements of his existence as a person having a wife and a family and a home. Therefore, it is not an expense incurred "wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the profession." It seems to me that the commissioners reached a right conclusion in respect of the period of term time, but were not justified in reaching a different conclusion as regards the period of the vacation.

Taxpayer's appeal dismissed. Crown's cross-appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Darley, Cumberland & Co. (for the taxpayer); Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Crown).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

HANILY v. MINISTER OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT & PLANNING AND ANOTHER

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Parker, J.), April 28, 29, 1952.]

Compulsory Purchase—Building land—Compulsory purchase by Central Land Board—Power of board to acquire land for disposal for permitted development—"Development for which permission has been granted"—Valid permission not obtained before purchase and confirmation orders—Owner unwilling to sell at existing use value—Acceptance of offer from prospective purchaser at owner's price—Function of board to prevent sales for more than existing use value—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 43 (1) (2).

Town and Country Planning—Permission for development—Person hoping to acquire interest in the land—Obligation of authority to notify owner of application—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 14 (1).

Without the knowledge of the owner of land, which she was offering for sale, manufacturers applied to the local planning authority and obtained from them permission to develop the land by erecting a factory thereon. They then offered the owner £400 to £450 for the land on the basis of its existing use value, and, when the owner refused to accept less than £2,100, they applied to the Central Land Board to exercise their powers of purchase under s. 43 (1) and (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. Negotiations by the district valuer for the purchase of the land by agreement were entered into, but on Apr. 28, 1950, the owner accepted an offer of £1,750 from a third party. The board, being thus unable to acquire the land by agreement, on July 14, 1950, made a compulsory purchase order in respect of the land which, on Dec. 20, was confirmed by the Minister of Town and Country Planning.

HELD: (i) any person who genuinely hoped to acquire an interest in land could apply for planning permission in respect of it and not only the owner of the land or a prospective purchaser applying with the owner's consent, and, therefore, the manufacturers were competent to make an application for planning permission.

Observations of VAISEY, J., in Ayles v. Romsey & Stockbridge Rural District Council (1944) (108 J.P. 176), considered.

(ii) the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, did not require a local planning authority to notify likely objectors or the owner of the land of their consideration of an application for planning permission, and, therefore, the permission granted without such notification was valid.

(iii) even if the planning permission were invalid, the compulsory purchase and confirmation orders were not thereby invalidated since s. 43 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, required only that planning permission should have been obtained before the actual acquisition of the land, and the orders did not constitute such acquisition, but merely authority for acquisition.

Travis v. Minister of Local Government & Planning ([1951] 2 All E.R. 673), followed.

(iv) as the Central Land Board were exercising their powers of compulsory purchase to prevent a sale at a price above that for existing use value, the compulsory purchase and confirmation orders were valid notwithstanding the existence of a prospective purchaser willing to pay a price acceptable to the owner.

Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Town & Country Planning ([1951] 1 All E.R. 982), applied.

FOR THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1947, s. 43 (1) (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 25, p. 551.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Fitzwilliam's (Earl) Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Town & Country Planning, [1951] 1 All E.R. 982; affd. H.L. sub nom. Fitzwilliam's (Earl) Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Housing & Local Government, [1952] 1 All E.R. 509.
- (2) Ayles v. Romsey & Stockbridge Rural District Council, (1944), 108 J.P. 175; 88 Sol. Jo. 135; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) R. v. Hendon Rural District Council. Ex p. Chorley, [1933] 2 K.B. 696; 102 L.J.K.B. 658; 149 L.T. 535; 97 J.P. 210; Digest Supp.
- (4) Travis v. Minister of Local Government & Planning, [1951] 2 All E.R. 673; [1951] K.B. 956; 115 J.P. 500.

MOTION to quash a compulsory purchase order and a confirmation order made under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 43 (1) and (2).

The applicant was the owner of a piece of land which, on July 14, 1950, was made the subject of a compulsory purchase order by the Central Land Board under s. 43 (1) and (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. On Dec. 20, 1950, the order was confirmed by the Minister of Town and Country Planning (later the Minister of Local Government and Planning). The applicant contended that the orders were invalid because (i) at the time they were made there was no valid planning permission for the development of the land under Part III of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, since the persons who had applied for the permission were not the owners of the land and had no interest in it sufficient to support the application, and since the local planning authority, in purporting to grant permission, had not notified the owner of the land that they were considering the application, and, therefore, had not exercised their functions under the Act in a judicial manner; and (ii) the orders were made for the purpose of preferring one approved development of the land to another and not to bring the land into development, there being, besides the prospective purchaser on whose behalf the board had acted, a prospective purchaser whose offer to acquire the land had been accepted by the owner. The respondents, the Minister and the Central Land Board, denied that the planning permission was invalid or that it was necessary to obtain planning permission under s. 43 (1) of the Act of 1947 before the making of the orders since the orders constituted, not the acquisition of the land within the meaning of that enactment, but merely the authority for the subsequent acquisition. They contended further that the orders were valid notwithstanding the existence of another prospective purchaser willing to pay the price asked by the owner since the board were acquiring the land in pursuance of their powers in order to prevent sales at prices in excess of existing use value.

Sir Arthur Comyns Carr, Q.C., and Kekwick for the applicant.

The Attorney-General (Sir Lionel Heald, Q.C.) and J. P. Ashworth for the respondents.

PARKER, J.: This is a motion pursuant to para. 15 of sched. I to the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, on behalf of the applicant to quash a compulsory purchase order known as the Central Land Board (Southend Lane, Sydenham), Compulsory Purchase Order, 1950, and a confirmation order entitled the Central Land Board (Southend Lane, Sydenham) Compulsory Purchase Confirmation Order, 1950, on the ground that the making of those orders was not within the powers of the provision pursuant to which they purported to be made, viz., s. 43 (1) and (2) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, empowering the Central Land Board to acquire land in certain circumstances. Section 43 provides:

“(1) The Central Land Board may, with the approval of the Minister, by agreement acquire land for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of this Act, and in particular may so acquire any land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted under Part III of this Act on terms inclusive of any development charge payable under those provisions in respect of that development. (2) If the Minister is satisfied that it is expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire any land for any such purpose as aforesaid, and that the board are unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms, he may authorise the board to acquire the land compulsorily in accordance with the provisions of this section.”

The applicant was at all material times the owner of certain land at Southend Lane, Sydenham, in the metropolitan borough of Lewisham, on which there were eight cottages either condemned or partly demolished. In January, 1950, she was offering the land for sale for between £2,300 and £2,100, and was approached by a firm of sheet metal workers, Messrs. Blanshard Bros., who desired to acquire the site for the erection of a small factory. Unknown to the applicant, on Oct. 7, 1949, Blanshard Bros. had applied to the London County Council for planning permission for the erection of this factory, and on Dec. 16, 1949, they received what appears to be planning permission for its erection on the land. Blanshard Bros., however, having had the land valued on an existing use basis refused to pay more than £400 or £450. The applicant by her advisers was adamant that the least she would accept was £2,100, and towards the end of January and the beginning of February Blanshard Bros. in effect requested the Central Land Board to exercise their powers under s. 43 of the Act. As a result in April, 1950, the district valuer got in touch with the applicant with a view to purchasing the land by agreement. On Apr. 18 the applicant refused to sell at any price lower than that which she was asking. On Apr. 28 the applicant received an offer of £1,750 from a Mr. Terry, a builder or a joiner, who desired to acquire the site for the erection of a joinery workshop. This sum was finally accepted by the applicant and a draft contract was prepared by her solicitors and forwarded to Mr. Terry's solicitors for agreement. It was in those circumstances that, on July 14, 1950, the Central Land Board made the compulsory purchase order in question. There followed objections by the applicant. On Oct. 17 an inquiry at which the Minister of Town and Country Planning appointed somebody to hear the applicant's objections (an alternative procedure to a public inquiry) took place, the applicant appearing by counsel and voicing her objections. On Dec. 20 the Minister confirmed the compulsory purchase order.

Of the four grounds on which this motion is founded the fourth was by way of amendment no doubt as a result of the decision of the House of Lords on s. 43

(1) and (2) of the Act of 1947 in Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co. v. Minister of Housing & Local Government (1). The first two grounds were abandoned, and the case has been argued on grounds (iii) and (iv) which were as follows:

"(iii) That the said orders were made, not for the purpose of the functions of the Central Land Board or for the purpose of bringing into development the land to which the said orders relate, but for the purpose of preferring one approved development of the said land to another. (iv) Alternatively that at the time of the making of the said orders and each of them there was no planning permission under Part III of the said Act for the development for the purpose of which the land was to be disposed."

On the last point it is said that the document of Dec. 16, 1949, purporting to give Blanshard Bros. permission to erect a factory is invalid and a nullity in that, if I accept the applicant's evidence on affidavit—which I do—the application was not made by her or with her consent, she being in October, November and December, 1949, owner of the land. Section 12 and the other sections in Part III of the Act of 1947 are silent as to who should be the applicant for permission to develop land and whether it can only be the owner or somebody who either has or is about to have some interest in the land. Ayles v. Romsey & Stockbridge Rural District Council (2) decided by VAISEY, J., on Mar. 16, 1944, concerned s. 10 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, which is replaced, if not verbatim, in very much the same wording by s. 12 of the Act of 1947. Although the case is not very clearly reported, it is, I think, authority for this, that it is not anybody who can validly make an application for permission. The applicant in that case for permission—the plaintiff in the action—was a builder who, if his clients bought the land and obtained permission, would carry out the development for them. He deposited plans and applied for permission which was refused, and he then brought an action for a declaration that he had been or should have been granted permission. The report reads (88 Sol. Jo. 135):

"VAISEY, J., said that he was not disposed to think that an applicant under s. 10 (3) need necessarily have a present interest in the land . . . but he had difficulty in supposing that a person whose interest was only that he might be concerned as a contractor in building would be an applicant. The applicants should have been the owners of the land or the three persons who proposed to develop the land if consent were given."

Counsel for the applicant goes further and says that the only person who can make such an application is the owner of the land or a prospective purchaser who has the owner's consent. It is clear in the present case that the applicant knew nothing at all about the application for planning permission.

There is, however, in my view, nothing in Part III of the Act providing expressly or even impliedly that the applicant must be the owner or somebody applying with the owner's consent. If one looks at the matter before this difficult section—s. 43—became part of the law, it was clearly to any owner's advantage that planning permission in respect of his land should be given and it mattered not to him who obtained that permission. Once permission was obtained it would enhance the value of his land and he would be the last person to complain. It seems to me that under Part III of this Act anybody who genuinely hopes to acquire the interest in the land can properly apply for planning permission. It is said that the implication generally in ss. 18 to 23 of the Act of 1947 is that the person applying should be the owner or somebody with the owner's consent. I get very little help from those sections. It seems to me that more help is to be derived from the fact that the only person who is contemplated as an aggrieved person able to appeal to the Minister under s. 16 is a person who has himself applied for planning permission.

In the alternative it is said that, even if the application need not be made by the owner or with his consent, at least the planning authority must notify the owner and give him an opportunity to raise objections and generally to be heard. But there are no provisions in the statute or in the Town and Country Planning (General Development) Order, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 958) (now superseded by the Town and Country Planning General Development Order and Development Charge Applications Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 728), art. 12) relating to town planning for such matters as advertisement or notification of any particular person or of the owner. The only provision with regard to informing people of applications and permissions is, apparently, to be found in art. 12 of the order of 1948. That article provided for a register to be kept in which particulars were to be entered of any applications for permission and of any decisions resulting. That register is required to be kept in a particular form and at a convenient place, and by s. 14 (5) of the Act of 1947 is to be available for inspection of the public at all reasonable hours. It is, however, said that, although there is no statutory provision relating to this matter, the proceedings before the town planning authority are in the nature of judicial proceedings and on general principle in such proceedings the tribunal must give any person likely to be affected or interested an opportunity of appearing before it and being heard. Reference was made to R. v. Hendon Rural District Council. Ex p. Chorley (3), but it is to be observed that in that case the rural district council, though not, apparently, bound to do so, did, in fact, give notice of the application. Further, proceedings before a town planning authority may well be in the nature of judicial proceedings so that certiorari will lie, but, in my view, it does not follow that any particular procedure such as is adopted in courts of law must necessarily be adopted in those proceedings. It seems to me that one must look at the legislation which is in question and see whether under that legislation it is required that persons or any particular person should be notified and be heard. Under the scheme of this legislation I can see no ground for saying that any particular notice should be given to an owner or that the owner should be given an opportunity of being heard.

In my opinion, this planning permission was perfectly valid, but it has been argued that, if I am wrong in that and if the planning permission is invalid, it does not follow that the orders in question were ultra vires. It is said that it is sufficient if planning permission has been obtained at any moment prior to the actual acquisition of the land and that these orders do not amount to an acquisition of the land, but merely give authority for its acquisition. On behalf of the Crown reliance is placed on the decision of DEVLIN, J., in Travis v. Minister of Local Government & Planning (4), where he held that, assuming that the words in s. 43 (1) of the Act of 1947 empowering the board to "acquire any land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted" referred to the time of acquisition and not to the purpose for which the board could acquire land, land was "acquired" within the meaning of the sub-section neither when the compulsory purchase order was made by the board nor when the confirmation order was made by the Minister, but only when it was actually acquired, in the ordinary sense of the word "acquire," after notice to treat, and, therefore, the applicant had failed to show that the compulsory purchase order was premature because planning permission had not been given before it was made. That decision was given between the hearing of Fitzwilliam's case (1) in the Court of Appeal and its decision in the House of Lords and it is argued on behalf of the applicant that DEVLIN, J.'s decision is inconsistent with the speeches in the House of Lords in that case. It is further said with considerable force that, although a meticulous reading of s. 43 (1) and (2) of the Act of 1947 might support DEVLIN, J.'s decision, no court should be astute to read those words meticulously having regard to the possible results which would follow, because, if DEVLIN, J.'s decision is right, there might be negotiations for a purchase by agreement, there might be a compulsory purchase order, there might be a public inquiry, there might be a confirmation by the Minister, there might be a notice to treat and an arbitration, and, if at the end of that and immediately before the acquisition was going to be completed the planning authorities were to be approached for the first time and refused permission, the whole of the previous proceedings would have been a farce. It seems to me that there is nothing in the speeches in Fitzwilliam's case (1) which throws any light on DEVLIN, J.'s decision. The point was not present, as it seems to me, in any of their lordships' minds, and I think it would be wrong to take isolated words from speeches and seek to argue that they differ in some way from the decision arrived at by DEVLIN, J. That being so, I consider myself bound by DEVLIN, J.'s decision, with which I entirely agree. While appreciating the argument that, if it is right, in certain circumstances an absurd position might be created, it seems to me that the real safeguard is to be found in the powers to be exercised by the Minister. No land can be acquired by agreement without the Minister's approval and no land can be compulsorily acquired without the order being confirmed by the Minister, and, no doubt, as a matter of administration he would take good care that his approval was not given, or a confirmation order made, unless planning permission had been obtained or was on the point of being obtained.

The second point taken on behalf of the applicant was that the Central Land Board were here preferring one person to another. In effect it is said that a close scrutiny of the speeches in Fitzwilliam's case (1) in the House of Lords shows that the power given by s. 43 (1) and (2) of the Act of 1947 can only be used if development is threatened to be held up. It was urged that this power can only be exercised if, a single developer alone being available, he refuses to pay the price asked and the development charge and will not buy unless he can buy at the existing use value, but that, if there are one or more developers who are willing to pay the price asked, albeit above the existing use value, and in addition to pay the development charge, the powers given by the section cannot be exercised. It seems to me that that cannot be said to follow from the speeches in the House of Lords. The Court of Appeal had clearly said that the board might exercise their powers to prevent sales at more than the existing use value. If one pauses there, it is clear in this case that when, on Apr. 28, Mr. Terry offered to pay £1,750, which was in excess of the existing use value, and that offer was accepted, there was a real threat that, if the board did not exercise their powers, the land would be sold at more than the existing use value. As it seems to me, there is nothing in the speeches in the House of Lords which would lead one to suppose that they disapproved of the Court of Appeal's interpretation of the board's powers. For my part I get most assistance from the speech of LORD TUCKER, who says ([1952] 1 All E.R. 519):

"I think that unrestricted sales on a large scale at prices in excess of existing use value would render more difficult the proper ascertainment of the true existing use value which is a necessary element in calculating the development charge, and that, it being the function of the board to collect the charge to set it against the payments which they will have to make out of the £300,000,000 compensation fund, a policy which tends to facilitate and ensure a speedy payment of the charge by including it in the sale price is a policy the implementing of which is connected with their fiscal functions under the Act."

It seems to me that, if the argument on behalf of the applicant is right and the board cannot exercise their powers if there is a developer willing to pay, in effect, the development value plus the development charge, the functions of the board would become almost impossible because an existing use value, presumably, must bear some relation to existing facts, and, if a series of sales in excess of the current existing use value were permitted, a time would come when the existing use value would become equivalent to the development value. It must be part of the board's functions to prevent sales for more than existing use value, and it seems to me that in the circumstances of this case there was a real reason to believe that the applicant, left to herself, would sell this land at more than its existing use value. Therefore, I see nothing ultra vires in the order made by the board or the order of confirmation by the Minister, and this motion must be refused.

Application refused.

Solicitors: Stow & Co. (for the applicant); Treasury Solicitor (for the respondents).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

B LEE v. LEE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.JJ., and Roxburgh, J.), February 12, 1952.]

Husband and Wife—Possession of property—Husband restrained from selling matrimonial home—Right of wife to reside in house until provision of alternative accommodation—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (c. 75), s. 17.

The parties were married in 1937 and thereafter they lived together in a house of which the husband owned the freehold. On Sept. 2, 1948, the husband deserted the wife and the three children of the marriage, leaving them in the matrimonial home. In 1951, on an application by the wife to the county court under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, for an order restraining the husband from entering into any contract for the sale of the house, the county court judge directed that she and the children should be permitted to reside in the house until the husband provided suitable alternative accommodation for them and that he should "take no step by sale or assignment of any right title or interest which he now has in the said property or by any other act whatsoever create any right title or interest in any other person to evict his wife and children or any of them from the matrimonial home or in any way interfere with their residence therein."

HELD: in the exercise of his discretion under s. 17 the county court judge had jurisdiction to make the order.

AS TO PROCEEDINGS BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE IN REGARD TO PROPERTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 16, p. 740, para. 1211; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 260, 261, Nos. 2296-2303.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Thompson v. Earthy, [1951] 2 All E.R. 235; [1951] 2 K.B. 596.
- (2) Kelner v. Kelner, [1939] 3 All E.R. 957; [1939] P. 411; 108 L.J.P. 138; Digest Supp.
- (3) Stewart v. Stewart, [1947] 2 All E.R. 813; [1948] 1 K.B. 507; [1948] L.J.R. 799; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Errington v. Errington, [1952] 1 All E.R. 149.

APPEAL by the husband, Hubert Arthur Lee, from an order of His Honour JUDGE WILLES, made at Alfreton County Court on Oct. 24, 1951, on an application by the wife under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

On Nov. 10, 1937, the parties were married and thereafter they lived together in a house known as "Timberscombe" of which the husband owned the freehold. On Sept. 2, 1948, the husband left the matrimonial home. In October, 1948, proceedings were taken by the wife against her husband before justices, and an order was made by consent whereby the husband agreed to pay £4 a week for the maintenance of the wife and the three children of the marriage and further agreed to grant to the wife a lease for two years of "Timberscombe" at a rent of 1s. a year, if demanded. In December, 1950, the husband sought to recover possession of "Timberscombe" from the wife by proceedings before the justices, but these were unsuccessful. In 1951 the husband was in financial difficulties and an overdraft of £1,500 owing to the bank was secured by a charge on the property. On Apr. 5, 1951, the wife applied to the county court under s. 17 of the Act of 1882 for an order that, inter alia, the husband be restrained from entering into any contract for the sale or conveyance of the property which might interfere with her enjoyment of it. The county court judge made an order that the husband should permit his wife and children to occupy "Timberscombe" as the matrimonial home until he provided suitable alternative accommodation for them, and that he should take no step by sale or assignment of any right, title, or interest which he had in the property, or by any other act create any right, title, or interest in any other person to evict his wife and children from the property or in any way interfere with their residence therein.

A. P. Fletcher for the husband.

Mitchison, Q.C., and C. A. M. Blake for the wife.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of His Honour JUDGE WILLES made under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by which he said:

"I direct and order Hubert Arthur Lee until further or other order varying this order is made by this court, to permit his wife . . . and her three children to reside in and occupy 'Timberscombe' as the matrimonial home of the [wife] and [the husband] and unless and until he shall first have provided reasonably suitable alternative accommodation as a matrimonial home for his wife and children. I order and direct that Hubert Arthur Lee shall take no step by sale or assignment of any right title or interest which he now has in the said property or by any other act whatsoever create any right title or interest in any other person to evict his wife and children or any of them from the matrimonial home or in any way interfere with their residence therein."

In Thompson v. Earthy (1) a deserted wife and her two children lived in the matrimonial home, which was the husband's property, in fulfilment of the husband's undertaking given to the justices that the wife should be permitted to live there rent free. In breach of that undertaking, the husband sold the house to a purchaser for value who claimed, and, as ROXBURGH, J., held, was entitled to, possession. In consequence, the undertaking given by the husband to the justices was of no effect and the wife was ejected. That decision may be the reason why the learned judge in the present case made the order in the terms which I have stated.

Counsel for the husband contended that the learned judge had no jurisdiction to make the order which he did. It seems to me plain that he has. Counsel submitted that, although the words of s. 17 are discretionary, one ought not to regard that discretion as exercisable on a question of title. He agreed that sometimes there might be an obscurity or a dispute as to title. An illustration, suggested by one of my brethren, was that there may be wedding presents and it is uncertain which belong to the husband and which to the wife, and in such a case the court is free to cut the Gordian knot in a way which seems reasonably fair without going into long investigations. I am inclined to agree with counsel to this extent—and this is clearly what SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., had in mind in Kelner v. Kelner (2), on which counsel for the husband relied—that, if the question is one of title only, it has, of course, to be decided according to law, but, if the question is whether A or B owns a piece of jewellery or whatever it may be, s. 17 confers on the court a wide discretion, although that does not mean that the question can be decided in some arbitrary manner and that the husband should be given some article, which is manifestly the wife's, because the wife has behaved badly. If the question is one of title it must be decided so far as possible according to evidence regarding the ownership of the property. But that does not seem to me to be this case. The learned county court judge has accepted the position that the title is the husband's.

A Counsel, however, says that his proposition is wider than that which I have accepted and that under the section there is no jurisdiction to interfere with the exercise of proprietary rights, though he admits that the court can make an order dealing with possession which is a proprietary right and often the most important one. The jurisdiction to do that is plainly shown in Stewart v. Stewart (3), a decision of this court. In that case the county court judge had made an order the effect of which was that the wife had to vacate the premises, and the question was whether he had jurisdiction to do this. TUCKER, L.J., B (with whom BUCKNILL, L.J., and ROXBURGH, J., agreed), said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 814):

C "In the particular circumstances of the present case it was pressed on the learned judge that he should not make an order for possession except on the terms that it was not to take effect unless and until the husband had provided other accommodation elsewhere for the wife. That is an order which he might very well have made, but I find it impossible to say that, in refusing to make an order in that form, he was not exercising his discretion in a judicial manner."

D That is plain authority (and I think it has been accepted for a long time) that under s. 17 the court can protect the possession of the wife—in this case, the wife and children—and can make an order in the terms to which TUCKER, L.J. referred. If the court can do that, it follows that it must be able to make the consequential restriction on the husband's rights so that he cannot, as happened in Thompson v. Earthy (1), make the order a nullity of no effect by selling or transferring the property without any stipulation as to his wife's possession. E Therefore, I would be exceedingly unwilling to come to the conclusion that the learned county court judge could not do what he did in the present case, and, so far from finding anything in the statute to preclude him from doing what he has done, the words of the statute are in the widest possible form—the court can make such order with respect to the title to or possession of the property in dispute as it thinks fit.

F The learned judge made a careful and full review of the authorities and came to the conclusion that there was no case directly in point, though there were orders which went some way to support the conclusion to which he came. He said that if there was no authority he considered it his duty to make a precedent, and in the exercise of his discretion he made the order to which I have referred. In my opinion, there was jurisdiction for him to make that order, it was a proper order on the evidence before him, and this appeal must be dismissed.

G DENNING, L.J.: The judge made this order so as to prevent the husband from selling the house over his wife's head as the husband did in Thompson v. Earthy (1). If the husband sells the house over his wife's head and a purchaser buys it in good faith for value without notice of any right or interest in the wife, the purchaser can eject the wife. To forestall that danger in the present case the judge made an order restraining the husband from disposing of the house to H the prejudice of his wife. I think he had ample jurisdiction to make that order. The words of s. 17 of the Act of 1882 are quite wide enough for the purpose. I do not suggest that the judge could have made an order transferring the title in the house to the wife, but he certainly had jurisdiction to protect her in her occupation of it, even to the extent of preventing the husband from disposing of it. The order confirms and protects her special right as a deserted wife to stay there—a right which as has been repeatedly recognised in this court. It seems to me that, if a purchaser should buy with notice of that right, or, at any rate, with notice of the order, he could not, in disregard of it, eject the wife: see Errington v. Errington (4). I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Cunliffe & Airy, agents for Walker, Terry & Wilson, Belper (for the husband); Field, Roscoe & Co., agents for Ellis, Fermor & Shephard, Ripley (for the wife).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

LATIMER v. A. E. C., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.JJ.), April 30, May 1, 1952.]

Factory—Floor—Maintenance—Floor slippery from flood water and oil—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 25 (1).

Safe System of Work—Factory flooded in exceptional storm—Water mixed with oil—Floor rendered dangerously slippery—No want of care by occupiers—Accident through workman slipping—Liability of occupiers.

Owing to a downpour of rain of an unprecedented character and through no want of reasonable care on the part of the occupiers, a factory was flooded and oil from a cooling mixture pumped to machines through channels in the floor became mixed with water. As the water receded, the floor, which was level and structurally perfect, was left in a wet and oily and slippery state, and could not be entirely cleared at once. In the course of his duty a workman slipped on a floor and was injured.

HELD: (i) the occupiers were not in breach of their duty to see that the floor was "properly maintained" under s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, since "maintained", as defined in s. 152 (1), meant maintained in good repair and did not mean kept free from danger through slipperiness.

(ii) it would not have been reasonable for the occupiers to have closed the factory on account of the danger caused by a slippery floor, and, therefore, they had not been negligent in permitting the plaintiff to work in the factory and were not liable in damages at common law.

Decision of PILCHER, J. ([1952] 1 All E.R. 443), reversed on the second point.

FOR THE FACTORIES ACT, 1937, s. 25 (1), and s. 152 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 1017, 1116.

Cases referred to:

(1) Davies v. De Havilland Aircraft Co., Ltd., [1950] 2 All E.R. 582; [1951] 1 K.B. 50; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Galashiels Gas Co., Ltd. v. O'Donnell or Millar, [1949] 1 All E.R. 319; [1949] A.C. 275; [1949] L.J.R. 540; 113 J.P. 144; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of PILCHER, J., dated Feb. 8, 1952, reported [1952] 1 All E.R. 443, awarding the plaintiff £550 damages for personal injuries sustained as a result of an accident while working in the defendants' factory.

The learned judge held that there had been no breach by the defendants of the duty created by s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, properly to maintain the floors in the factory, but that the defendants had been negligent at common law in permitting the plaintiff to work in the factory when they knew it to be in a potentially dangerous condition.

Burton, Q.C., Marven Everett, Q.C., and Ripman for the defendants.
Jukes for the plaintiff.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: In the course of his judgment PILCHER, J., said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 445):

- A "In support of his argument counsel submitted that the situation which faced the defendants on the evening in question was no different from that which faces any employer who permits his servant to use a machine which is, to his knowledge, potentially dangerous owing to a defect which no care and skill on his part can remedy until, let it be supposed, a spare part not immediately available is procured and fitted. In such a case it is clear that the employer will be liable if he causes or permits the servant to use the machine and the servant is injured by an accident due to its known defective condition. It is difficult to see why the same situation should not obtain in regard to employers' premises if they are in a dangerous condition."
- B With all respect to the learned judge, I think there is a difference. If a machine is dangerous, it may be that it is the duty of the employer forthwith to say: "Do not use that machine until it has been put in order. It is not safe." On the other hand, if, through something for which the employers are not responsible, the floor of their factory has become slippery in parts and, as here, they are unable to remove all slipperiness from it before the night shift comes to work, the position is not precisely the same. I cannot see that it is the duty of the employers then to say: "No one must work in the factory until all the floor has had removed from it the character of slipperiness which it got through the flood." It must be a question of degree, and various matters have to be considered. PILCHER, J., went on to say (ibid.):
- C "As soon as the employer is made aware that his premises are potentially dangerous and that the dangerous condition cannot be immediately remedied by care and skill on his part, a proper regard for the safety of servants who would normally work in such dangerous premises would seem to require that some action should be taken by him. If the only course open to the employer consistent with due regard to his servants' safety is to shut his premises, then I am satisfied that he is not entitled to escape liability for a servant who is injured by the dangerous condition of the premises by saying: 'These premises were rendered dangerous through no fault of mine. I knew they were dangerous, but at the time you were injured the danger could not have been removed by any care and skill on my part.'"
- D I would agree that, if the employers' premises were rendered dangerous by fire and there was a risk of the roof falling or a risk of a wall collapsing on the workmen, it may well be the duty of the employer to say: "No man must work in this factory until steps have been taken to secure the portions which have been endangered by fire", and to make sure that the men do not run unnecessary risks, but I think the position is different when all that has happened to the premises is that the floor is slippery. Towards the end of his judgment PILCHER, J., said (ibid., 446):
- E "I have only to consider whether I am satisfied that the defendants acted with due regard to the safety of the plaintiff when they permitted him to work in premises which they knew to be potentially dangerous through no fault of their own. I am not so satisfied, and I think that in all the circumstances of the case the defendants, in permitting the plaintiff to do his ordinary work in a part of the factory where the floor was slippery, and, therefore, dangerous, took the risk that he might sustain an injury and are thus liable for the injury which the plaintiff in fact sustained owing to the dangerous condition of the premises. No doubt, they were faced with a difficult situation, and I do not shrink from the conclusion that the defendants' duty in the particular circumstances, if they desired to escape liability for accidents due to the slippery condition of the floor, may have been to send away all men who were not prepared to volunteer for cleaning work—and when I use the word ‘volunteer’, I mean volunteer on such terms as would enable the defendants to rely, in the case of accident, on the defence of volenti non fit injuria. I, therefore, conclude that the defendants are liable to the plaintiff in respect of the accident which occurred and the consequent injuries which he sustained.”
- H

It seems to me that the learned judge has put on the defendants a higher duty than employers owe to their workmen at common law. The duty of the employer is to act reasonably towards his men and to take care in the way that a prudent employer would to see that his workmen are not exposed to unnecessary risks, and that obligation extends to the building in which they work, to the plant, and in some cases at least it covers the providing of a proper system of work. On the facts of the present case, the defendants had done all they could to put the factory into a proper condition. The judge so found, but he also found that in the circumstances the employers were at fault because they had permitted the plaintiff to work on the premises on the night shift on Aug. 31.

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that it was not necessary to say that men should not have been allowed to work in any part of the premises, but that it would have been sufficient to say that this particular part should not be used because the floor was slippery there. The difficulty I feel about the judge’s finding is that it was not pleaded and no question was asked which would go to support a conclusion that the employers were negligent in not closing their works altogether. If the position was such that consideration ought to have been given to a general closing down, it would have thrown out of work a great number of people on the night shift. There is no evidence to show how many people were employed at night, but the total number of employees at this factory was four thousand. The factory occupies fifteen acres. How many work at night we do not know, but if it had been said (say) at six o’clock on that evening: “There is going to be no night shift”, and if all those people who were ready to work that night had been thrown out of work, it would have raised some difficulties. No question was asked as to the nature of the work which was being done in this factory, or in this particular part of the factory—whether it was work of national importance, as it may have been. Not a single question was asked to show what it would have meant to close down this factory or some part of it. Indeed, the question of closing down the factory was not mentioned by anyone until the evidence had been given and completed.

In those circumstances, I do not think that the finding that the defendants were negligent and in breach of the duty they owed to the plaintiff by reason of the fact that they did not close down the premises can stand. There was no complaint by a shop steward or any workman, nor is there any evidence to show that any other workman slipped. If the test is, as I believe, what a reasonable employer would have done in those circumstances, I fail to see that there is any breach by the employers of the duty which they owed, and I fail to see, too, any evidence on which a finding that the employers were negligent in not closing the factory can be based.

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that in any event the plaintiff should be held entitled to maintain this judgment on the ground that there was a breach of the statutory duty laid down or required by s. 25 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. Section 25 (1) reads:

“All floors, steps, stairs, passages and gangways shall be of sound construction and properly maintained.”

The place at which the plaintiff slipped, said counsel, was part of the floor or a gangway, and he directed our attention to the definition of the word “maintained” which is contained in s. 152 (1) of the Act:

“‘Maintained’ means maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair.”

Counsel for the plaintiff said that the floor was not properly maintained by reason of the fact that it was in some parts slippery. PILCHER, J., took an opposite view, and in his judgment he said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 444):

A "I am satisfied that this argument cannot succeed. The marginal note to s. 25 is: 'Construction and maintenance of floors, passages and stairs.' The words 'construction' and 'maintenance' are in apposition, and I am satisfied that in its context the natural meaning of the word 'maintained' is 'maintained in a good state of repair'. It is not suggested that the floor on which the plaintiff slipped was in any way uneven or out of repair. It is, moreover, to be observed that the definition of the word 'maintained' in s. 152 (1) of the Act is as follows: "'Maintained" means maintained in an efficient state, in efficient working order, and in good repair.' While the words 'in an efficient state' and 'in efficient working order' are more appropriate to machines than to floors, I am satisfied that the floor of the gangway in question, which was level and structurally perfect, had been properly 'maintained' within the meaning of this word in s. 25 (1), although at the material time its surface was wet and oily."

B That decision of the learned judge seems to me to be in accord with what was said by SOMERVELL, L.J., when sitting as an additional judge of the King's Bench Division, in Davies v. De Havilland Aircraft Co., Ltd. (1), where the learned lord justice said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 583):

D "Assuming that there was, as I have found, water that might be slippery at the time in question, or assuming that there was an unexplained patch of oil, I do not think that that amounts to a failure by the defendants to comply with the duty imposed on them by those words. The fact that for an uncertain period and in circumstances which no one can explain there was a patch of oil does not seem to me to amount to a failure to maintain. I hold that the facts do not amount to a breach of this requirement. Equally (and the evidence on this must be very carefully considered because it was not the plaintiff's case), if there was a slight depression in the concrete in which water collected when it rained so that the floor became slippery, I do not think that, on the evidence, that amounts to a breach of s. 25 (1). It would be impracticable to maintain passages and roads and pathways so that there was never a slippery place, especially after rain, on which a man might slip. Slipping is quite a common incident of life, and usually no harm is done. The victim usually suffers no permanent injury, but, unfortunately, the plaintiff received serious damage to his ankle."

F I agree with that and I do not think that the plaintiff can succeed under s. 25 (1). For these reasons, I am satisfied that the appeal of the defendants must succeed, and that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

G DENNING, L.J.: I agree. It seems to me that the learned judge has fallen into error by assuming that it was sufficient to constitute negligence that there was a foreseeable risk which the defendants could have avoided by some measure or other, however extreme. That is not the law. It is always necessary to consider what measures the defendants could have taken and to say whether they could reasonably be expected of them. Let me give a converse case. A man tries to stop a runaway horse. It is a known and serious risk, but no one would suggest that he could reasonably be expected to stand idly by. It is not negligence on his part to run the risk. So here the employers knew that the floor was slippery and that there was some risk in letting the men work on it, but, still, they could not reasonably be expected to shut down the whole works and send all the men home. In every case of foreseeable risk it is a matter of balancing the risk against the measures necessary to eliminate it. It is only negligence if, on balance, the defendants did something which they ought not to have done or omitted to do something which they ought to have done. In the circumstances of this case it is clear that the defendants did everything they could reasonably be expected to do. It would be quite unreasonable to expect them to send all the men home. I agree, therefore, that there was no negligence at common law.

With regard to the Factories Act, 1937, I would only say that in considering s. 25 (1) it is necessary to distinguish between the floor itself and the things on it, be they solids or liquids. So far as the floor itself is concerned—I refer to soundness—the duty is absolute. Even if there is a latent defect which could not have been discovered by reasonable care, nevertheless there is a breach of s. 25 (1): see Galashiels Gas Co., Ltd. v. O'Donnell or Millar (2), but so far as things on the floor are concerned s. 25 (1) does not apply. The duty in regard to them is either at common law the duty of reasonable care, or in some circumstances, under s. 26 of the Act, a duty to do what is reasonably practicable. There is not much difference between s. 26 and the common law so far as master and servant are concerned, but there may be a good deal of difference so far as the question of invitor and invitee is concerned. In this case there was nothing wrong with the floor itself, and, therefore, there was not a breach of s. 26 (1).

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Carpenters (for the defendants); Rowley, Ashworth & Co. (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

TARBOX v. ST. PANCRAS BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 5, 1952.]

Practice—Particulars—Particulars given by reference to plan.

By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that, while he was walking on a pavement in the defendants' borough, a servant of the defendants swept some rubbish under his feet causing him to fall and suffer injury. The defendants applied to the master for particulars as to the place where the plaintiff alleged that he was walking, the position of the defendants' servant when sweeping the rubbish, and the position in which the plaintiff fell. The master directed that these particulars should be given by marking the positions on a plan.

HELD: the master, having decided that the particulars were necessary, had a discretion to order that they should be given in the form which was most convenient to the parties, and, therefore, the order should not be disturbed.

AS TO PARTICULARS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 275-282, paras. 465-467; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Pleading, pp. 184-207, Nos. 1561-1741.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of DONOVAN, J., dated Apr. 7, 1952, affirming an order of Master BAKER on an application by the defendants for further and better particulars of the statement of claim.

By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that he was walking along the pavement in Kentish Town Road at or near its junction with Dewsbury Terrace in the defendants' borough, and a servant or agent of the defendants swept rubbish, including a tin lid, into the plaintiff's path and under his foot so that he slipped and fell. The defendants asked for particulars of the place where the plaintiff alleged he was walking, the position in which it was alleged that the defendants' servant or agent was when sweeping the rubbish, and the position in which it was alleged that the plaintiff fell. The master ordered that the particulars should be given by indicating the positions on a scale plan agreed between the parties, or, failing agreement, on a plan prepared by the defendants and marked by the plaintiff.

Vester for the plaintiff.

Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: Counsel for the plaintiff submits there is no power to order particulars to be indicated on a plan. I do not agree with that argument. I think that the court, having come to the conclusion that certain particulars are necessary, must have a discretion to order that they should be given in the form which is obviously most convenient to both parties. In the course of the argument I instanced a claim relating to a right of way. It might be most complicated, and, indeed, very unhelpful to the court, if the exact course of the right of way could be specified only in words. It might be to everybody's convenience—and to enable the defendants to know the case which they had to meet—that there should be power to order that such particulars should be marked on a plan. It is a matter for the master, of course, to consider in what cases such a means of indication would be desirable. No doubt, if there was any ground for thinking that it was oppressive to the plaintiff compared with the normal course of expressing the particulars in words that would be taken into account. I have come to the conclusion that one cannot say that such an order cannot be made. It seems to me an eminently reasonable method in the circumstances of this case to ask the plaintiff to indicate to the best of his recollection—which is all that he can do—where he was and where the defendants' servant was and where he fell. For these reasons I think this appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Chesham & Co. (for the plaintiff); William Charles Crocker (for the defendants).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BENDALL v. McWHIRTER.

F [COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), April 2, 3, May 5,

Med. FERRIS v. WEAVER. [1952]
1 E.R. 233.

ty available for distribution—Matrimonial home—Deserted in occupation—Right of trustee to possession.

Med. HOLE v. CUZEN. [1953]
1 E.R. 87.

a deserted wife to stay in the matrimonial home proceeds out of an irrevocable personal licence which the husband is presumed in law to have conferred on her. Her occupation is comparable with that of a contractual licensee, save that her licence is not revocable except by an order of the court, and, as a contractual licensee who is in actual occupation of the land, she has an interest which is valid, if not at law, then in equity, against the successors in title of her husband, including his trustee in bankruptcy. The property of the bankrupt passes to the trustee in bankruptcy subject to all the equities and liabilities which affect it in the bankrupt's hands, and, therefore, the trustee takes the property subject to the clog or fetter that the wife cannot be ejected from the property.

Errington v. Errington ([1952] 1 All E.R. 149), applied.

Clore v. Theatrical Properties, Ltd., and Westby & Co., Ltd. ([1936] 3 All E.R. 483), doubted.

Semble, the trustee could make an application under s. 105 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, for an order that the wife should give up possession, or (per DENNING, L.J., SOMERVELL and ROMER, L.J.J., dubitante) he could compel the husband to allow an application for possession to be made in his name under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882.

AS TO PROPERTY OF BANKRUPT PASSING TO TRUSTEE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 2, p. 209, para. 278; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 5, pp. 630-638, Nos. 5676-5738.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Bramwell v. Bramwell, [1942] 1 All E.R. 137; [1942] 1 K.B. 370; 111 L.J.K.B. 430; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Hutchinson v. Hutchinson, [1947] 2 All E.R. 792; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Stewart v. Stewart, [1947] 2 All E.R. 813; [1948] 1 K.B. 507; [1948] L.J.R. 799; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Lee v. Lee, ante p. 1299.
- (5) Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander, [1949] 2 All E.R. 822; [1950] 1 K.B. 311; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Middleton v. Baldock, [1950] 1 All E.R. 708; [1950] 1 K.B. 657; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Bolton v. Prentice, (1744), 1 Selwyn's N.P. 233; 2 Stra. 1214; 93 E.R. 1136; 27 Digest 199, 1695.
- (8) Manby v. Scot, (1663), 1 Keb. 482 (83 E.R. 1065); 1 Lev. 4 (83 E.R. 268); 1 Mod. Rep. 124 (86 E.R. 781); 1 Sid. 109 (82 E.R. 1000); 27 Digest 183, 1498.
- (9) Robson v. Headland, (1948), 64 T.L.R. 596; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (10) Errington v. Errington, [1952] 1 All E.R. 149.
- (11) Cristel v. Cristel, [1951] 2 All E.R. 574; [1951] 2 K.B. 725.
- (12) Thompson v. Earthy, [1951] 2 All E.R. 235; [1951] 2 K.B. 596; 115 J.P. 407.
- (13) Re Wait, [1927] 1 Ch. 606; 96 L.J.Ch. 179; 136 L.T. 552; 39 Digest 678, 2644.
- (14) Webb v. Paternoster, (1619), Poph. 151 (79 E.R. 1250); 2 Roll. Rep. 143 (81 E.R. 713); Godb. 282 (78 E.R. 165); Palm. 71 (81 E.R. 983); 30 Digest, Replacement, 540, 1744.
- (15) Wood v. Lake, (1751), Say. 3; 96 E.R. 783; 30 Digest, Replacement, 537, 1713.
- (16) Taylor v. Waters, (1816), 7 Taunt. 374; 129 E.R. 150; 30 Digest, Replacement, 530, 1630.
- (17) Wallis v. Harrison, (1838), 4 M. & W. 538; 8 L.J.Ex. 44; 150 E.R. 1543; subsequent proceedings, (1839), 5 M. & W. 142; 151 E.R. 61; 19 Digest 28, 130.
- (18) Wood v. Leadbitter, (1845), 13 M. & W. 838; 14 L.J.Ex. 161; 4 L.T.O.S. 433; 9 J.P. 312; 153 E.R. 351; 30 Digest, Replacement, 542, 1771.
- (19) Hurst v. Picture Theatres, Ltd., [1915] 1 K.B. 1; 83 L.J.K.B. 1837; 111 L.T. 972; 30 Digest, Replacement, 540, 1742.
- (20) Winter Garden Theatre (London), Ltd. v. Millenium Productions, Ltd., [1947] 2 All E.R. 331; [1948] A.C. 173; [1947] L.J.R. 1422; 177 L.T. 349; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (21) Legg v. Evans, (1840), 6 M. & W. 36; 9 L.J.Ex. 102; 4 J.P. 123; 151 E.R. 311; 21 Digest 480, 598.
- (22) Tulk v. Moxhay, (1848), 2 Ph. 774; as reported in 1 H. & Tw. 105; 18 L.J.Ch. 83; 13 L.T.O.S. 21; 47 E.R. 1345; 30 Digest, Replacement, 424, 669.
- (23) Moreland v. Richardson, (1856), 22 Beav. 596 (52 E.R. 1238); 25 L.J.Ch. 883; subsequent proceedings, (1857), 24 Beav. 33 (53 E.R. 269); 26 L.J.Ch. 690; 21 J.P. 741; 35 Digest 402, 1436.
- (24) Andrew v. Aitken, (1882), 22 Ch.D. 218; 52 L.J.Ch. 294; 48 L.T. 148; 35 Digest 108, 131.

- (25) Sharpe v. Durrant, (1911), 55 Sol. Jo. 423; affd. [1911] W.N. 158; 19 Digest 95, 586.
- (26) De Mattos v. Gibson, (1858), 4 De G. & J. 276; 28 L.J.Ch. 165; 32 L.T.O.S. 268; 45 E.R. 108; 41 Digest 186, 265.
- (27) Lord Strathcona S.S. Co. v. Dominion Coal Co., [1926] A.C. 108; 95 L.J.P.C. 71; 134 L.T. 227; 41 Digest 321, 1800.
- A (28) London County Council v. Allen, [1914] 3 K.B. 642; 83 L.J.K.B. 1695; 111 L.T. 610; 78 J.P. 449; 40 Digest 302, 2602.
- (29) Re Webb, [1951] 2 All E.R. 131; [1951] 1 Ch. 808.
- (30) King v. David Allen & Sons, Billposting, Ltd., [1916] 2 A.C. 54; 85 L.J.P.C. 229; 114 L.T. 762; 30 Digest, Replacement, 542, 1763.
- (31) Taddy & Co. v. Sterious & Co., [1904] 1 Ch. 354; 73 L.J.Ch. 191; 89 L.T. 628; 39 Digest 526, 1406.
- B (32) Clore v. Theatrical Properties, Ltd. and Westby & Co., Ltd., [1936] 3 All E.R. 483; 30 Digest, Replacement, 535, 1703.
- (33) Lewisham Borough Council v. Maloney, [1947] 2 All E.R. 36; [1948] 1 K.B. 50; [1947] L.J.R. 991; 177 L.T. 175; 111 J.P. 454; 2nd Digest Supp.
- C (34) Brown v. Draper, [1944] 1 All E.R. 246; [1944] K.B. 309; 113 L.J.K.B. 196; 170 L.T. 144; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE NORRIS made at West Bromwich County Court on Jan. 9, 1952, in an action for possession.

The plaintiff, who was the trustee in bankruptcy of the defendant's husband, claimed possession of premises known as No. 1, Buttery Road, Smethwick, and the sum of £1 a week, for use and occupation by the defendant of the premises from Jan. 19, 1951, to Jan. 9, 1952. Before April, 1950, the defendant and her husband lived in the house of which he was the freeholder subject to a mortgage. On Apr. 14, 1950, the husband deserted the defendant, saying: "You can have the house and furniture. I am not coming back". Thereafter the defendant remained in the house with her children. On Nov. 27, 1950, she obtained a maintenance order against her husband for the payment of £3 a week for herself and 30s. in respect of one of the children of the marriage. On Jan. 3, 1951, a receiving order was made against the husband, and on Jan. 19, 1951, he was adjudicated bankrupt and the plaintiff was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy. The defendant continued to reside in the house with two of her children, paying no rent and the plaintiff paying the rates. The plaintiff requested the defendant to give up possession of the house as he wished to sell it to pay off the mortgage and distribute the balance among the other creditors, but she refused. On Nov. 23, 1951, the plaintiff brought the present proceedings for possession. The county court judge held that the defendant's occupation was that of a licensee and that the licence had been determined when the property was vested in the plaintiff and he had demanded possession. He was further of the opinion that proceedings under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, were not open to the plaintiff. He, accordingly, made an order for possession and mesne profits.

Muir Hunter for the defendant.

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and Sunderland for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

H May 5. SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree with the judgment which ROMER, L.J., will deliver and the reasons given in that judgment for allowing the appeal, and I have nothing which I wish to add to it.

The following judgments were read.

DENNING, L.J.: This case raises important questions about the right of a deserted wife to stay in the matrimonial home. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The first question is whether the wife has any right of her own to stay in the house. Under the old common law as it existed until seventy years ago she had no rights at all apart from those of her husband. She was treated by the law more like a piece of his furniture than anything else. The husband could not sue her in ejectment or trespass, but neither could he sue a piece of furniture. He could bundle his furniture out into the street and so he could his wife. The law did not say him nay. It merely gave the wife authority to pledge his credit for necessities. If her husband turned her out, she had to go and find lodgings elsewhere, pledging his credit for the rent, that is, if she could find anyone to trust to his credit. She could not in those days get an order for maintenance against her husband. She had to find someone who would take her in out of pity or charity or on the husband's credit. She could not pledge her own credit for she could not make a contract. Even if the husband did not turn her out, nevertheless, when he ceased for any reason to be entitled to the house she would have to leave it, for she had no right of her own to stay there. Thus, if the husband became bankrupt his assignees in bankruptcy could turn her out just as they could his furniture.

All that has changed now. A wife is no longer her husband's chattel. She is beginning to be regarded by the law as a partner in all affairs which are their common concern. Thus, the husband can no longer turn her out of the matrimonial home. She has as much right as he to stay there even though the house does stand in his name. This has only been decided in the last ten years. It started in 1942 when GODDARD, L.J., said that the husband's only way of getting his wife out of the house was to make an application under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882: see Bramwell v. Bramwell (1) ([1942] 1 K.B. 374). That section gives the court a very wide discretion in the matter, and, accordingly, in 1947 when a husband claimed that he had an absolute right to turn his wife out it was held that he had no such right, but that it was a matter for the discretion of the court: see Hutchinson v. Hutchinson (2). Very shortly afterwards this court took the same view (Stewart v. Stewart (3)), and it is now settled law that a deserted wife has a right, as against her husband, to stay in the matrimonial home unless and until an order is made against her under s. 17. In support of this right JUDGE WILLES recently made an order allowing a wife to stay until the husband found alternative accommodation, and restrained the husband from selling the house over her head, and we affirmed that order: Lee v. Lee (4). Moreover, it has been held that the wife's right is effective, not only as against her husband, but also as against the landlord. Thus, where a husband, who was statutory tenant of the matrimonial home, deserted his wife and left the house, it was held that the landlord could not turn her out so long as she paid the rent and performed the conditions of the tenancy. This right as against the landlord is a very special right on her part. She has to assert the right in her husband's name, but the husband cannot prevent her from exercising it. Even if he gives her notice to go, or purports to surrender the tenancy or to submit to judgment, nevertheless, she is entitled to stay: see Old Gate Estates, Ltd. v. Alexander (5); Middleton v. Baldock (6). In the latter case, SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., put it succinctly and simply in these words ([1950] 1 All E.R. 710):

"It seems to me that Mrs. Baldock, as the wife of Mr. Baldock, who had deserted her, beyond doubt was entitled to be in possession and to enjoy any right the tenant had under contract, statute, or otherwise, to live on the premises."

In short she has a right of her own, derived no doubt from her husband, but still a right of her own, to assert, on his behalf, the tenant-right in the premises, no matter what her husband may say or do about it.

What is the nature of this right of the deserted wife which the courts have thus evolved? It bears, I think, a very close resemblance to her right to pledge her husband's credit for necessities. Under the old common law when a husband deserted his wife, or they separated owing to his misconduct, she had an irrevocable authority to pledge his credit for necessities: Bolton v. Prentice (7), quoted in the notes to Manby v. Scot (8) (2 Smith L.C. 13th ed. 469). One of the most obvious necessities of a wife is a roof over her head, and if we apply the old rule to modern conditions it seems only reasonable to hold that when the husband is the tenant of the matrimonial home the wife should have an irrevocable authority to continue the tenancy on his credit, and that when he is the owner of it she should have an irrevocable authority to stay there. This authority, like the old one, is based on an irrebuttable presumption of law. The husband cannot revoke it except by order of the court under s. 17 of the Act of 1882. In my opinion, therefore, the right of a deserted wife to stay in the matrimonial home proceeds out of an irrevocable authority which the husband is presumed in law to have conferred on her. This accounts for the fact that the husband cannot turn the wife out. It also accounts for the fact that, as against the landlord, the wife must assert her right in the husband's name. The authority which is thus conferred on her is an authority to stay in the house until the court orders her to go out. This authority flows from the status of marriage, coupled with the fact of separation owing to the husband's misconduct. It ceases when the marriage comes to an end by death or divorce: Robson v. Headland (9); but it does not cease when there is a judicial separation: Hutchinson v. Hutchinson (2). The authority is, of course, purely personal to her. She alone can exercise it. She cannot assign it. It does not give her any legal interest in the land. She may, perhaps, sub-let some of the rooms so as to help keep herself, but even then, she does so, not out of any legal interest of her own in the land, but on the presumed authority of her husband. Her possession is not always exclusive. If the husband has only been guilty of desertion and nothing else he is entitled to come back at any time asking to be forgiven, and she is then bound to receive him. She cannot then keep him out of his house. But if he has, in addition to desertion, been guilty of cruelty or adultery, she is not bound to take him back. She can keep him out of the house. Her possession may then be quite exclusive. But, whether her possession is exclusive or not, there can be no doubt that she is not a tenant of her husband. She has only a personal privilege with no legal interest in the land, and she is, therefore, only a licensee: see Errington v. Errington (10). Her occupation is comparable with that of a contractual licensee, the only difference being that a contractual licence is revocable in accordance with the terms of the contract, whereas her licence is not revocable except by an order of the court. Sometimes her occupation is put by the parties on a contractual footing. Thus, when they are making the necessary arrangements consequent on desertion, the husband often agrees to let the wife live in the house until he has found her other accommodation, and she in return agrees to accept a lesser amount of maintenance on that account. That is what happened in Cristel v. Cristel (11), Thompson v. Earthy (12), and the present case. When such arrangements are made the wife's occupation rests, not on a presumed authority of the husband, but on an express authority which is co-extensive with it. In any case, however, the position of the wife is that she is a licensee with a special right under which her husband cannot turn her out except by an order of the court.

Such being the nature of the wife's right, the next question is whether it is binding on the trustee in bankruptcy. It is not every right created by a man which binds his trustee in bankruptcy. Take a contract by him to sell goods. If the property in the goods has not passed to the buyer at the time of the receiving order the trustee is under no obligation to deliver the goods. The trustee takes the goods free of the contract. The buyer has only a right to prove for damages: see Re Wait (13) ([1927] 1 Ch. 637-640), per ATKIN, L.J. On the other hand, take a contract by which the man before the bankruptcy gave a lien on his goods to a repairer. The trustee in bankruptcy takes subject to the lien just as he takes subject to a right to stop in transitu. Into which category does the wife's right come? Is it a clog or fetter on the land itself like a lien, or is it a mere personal claim like her claim to maintenance? There is no authority on this point. I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of ROMER, L.J., in which he holds that the trustee does take subject to the wife's right. I entirely agree with him, but for my own part I feel it necessary to go further and inquire what is the quality of the wife's right that it should lead to this result. I start with this. The wife's right is very analogous to a contractual licence to occupy land. It is, indeed, so analogous that I think no valid distinction can be made between them. If a contractual licence is not binding on the trustee in bankruptcy, but only gives rise to a right of proof, then I cannot think that the wife's right is binding on him, for it is of no higher quality, but if a contractual licence is binding on the trustee, like a lien, then I think the wife's right should also be binding on him. A B

We have recently held in this court that a contractual licence to occupy land is binding on the devisee of the licensor: see Errington v. Errington (10); and it seems to follow that it is also binding on his trustee in bankruptcy. Counsel for the plaintiff did not, indeed, contend the contrary. I put to him the case where a licensor grants the "front of the house" rights in a theatre to a licensee who goes into occupation of the rights and then the licensor goes bankrupt, and he conceded that the trustee in bankruptcy would be bound by the licence. Reason and justice both demand that this should be so, and I would not have felt it necessary to pursue the matter further but for the fact that the decision in Errington v. Errington (10) was questioned before us in another case. I have, therefore, felt it necessary to re-consider the matter. C

The objection that is made is that a contractual licence only gives rise to contractual obligations and not to any proprietary, rights or interests, and that the burden of it does not, therefore, run with the land. In answer to this objection let me start with the common law. In the year 1618 and for over two hundred years afterwards it was held that a contractual licence to use and occupy land, once it was acted on by entry into occupation, was binding, not only on the licensor, but also on his successors in title, and that it was not revocable except in accordance with the terms of the contract. If the licensor or his successor ejected the licensee or his goods in breach of the contract he was liable in assault or trespass, as the case might be: see Webb v. Paternoster (14), where a licence to stack hay was held binding on the successors of the licensor including his tenants; Wood v. Lake (15), where a parol licence to stack coals for seven years was held irrevocable except in accordance with the contract; Taylor v. Waters (16), where a licence to enjoy beneficial privileges in the opera house was held not to be revocable at will; and Wallis v. Harrison (17), where a licence to make and use a railway was held not binding on successors solely because it was still executory. Those cases were much considered in Wood v. Leadbitter (18), and the only criticism directed at them was that the licence should have been under seal. It was agreed (13 M. & W. 843, 847, 848) that the licence in Wood v. Leadbitter (18) and the other cases would have been good if they had been granted by deed. This is the very point at which the Judicature Acts come into play. Since the fusion of law and equity there is no necessity for a seal. Every contractual licence to use and occupy land, once acted on by entry into occupation, takes effect according to its tenor. It is not revocable at will. It is only revocable in accordance with the terms of the contract. If the licensor should attempt to eject the licensee in breach of the contract he is guilty of an assault: Hurst v. Picture Theatres, Ltd. (19); and if he should attempt to revoke the licence in breach of the contract the court of equity will grant an injunction to restrain him: Winter Garden Theatre (London), Ltd. v. Millenium Productions, Ltd. (20) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 336) per VISCOUNT SIMON; (ibid., 343) per LORD UTHWATT. This means that the law is restored to the position in which D E F G H it was for two hundred years before Wood v. Leadbitter (18) came to disturb it. The law is now just as that accomplished lawyer, SIR VICARY GIBBS, C.J., stated it in 1816 in Taylor v. Waters (16), when, delivering the reserved judgment of the full Court of Common Pleas, he said (7 Taunt. 384):

“ . . . a beneficial licence to be exercised upon land may be granted without deed, and cannot be countermanded, at least after it has been acted upon; and . . . this is not such an interest in land as, by the statute of frauds, can only pass by writing.”

It is not, therefore, an interest in property, but, nevertheless, once the licensee has entered into occupation it is, as PARKE, B., put it in 1838 in Wallis v. Harrison (17) (4 M. & W. 544), “ a sort of interest, against the licensor and his assigns ”, by which he meant, as I understand it, that it was a clog or fetter, like a lien, which is not an interest in property, but only a personal right to retain possession: Legg v. Evans (21) (6 M. & W. 42); but nevertheless it is, of course, effective against the owner and his assigns. The truth is, I think, that the old common lawyers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, without knowing it, applied to contractual licences some equitable principles which have since become well known. By dispensing with a seal when the licence had been acted on they anticipated the doctrine of part performance. By enforcing the licence against the successors of the licensor they anticipated the doctrine of restrictive covenants. Indeed, in modern times equity lawyers have reached the same result as the old common lawyers, but they have done it in their own way.

Let me now, therefore, turn to equity. Every contractual licence imports a negative covenant that the licensor will not interfere with the use and occupation of the licensee in breach of the contract. This negative covenant is binding on the successors in title of the licensor in the same way as a restrictive covenant is. It does not run with the land so as to give a cause of action in damages for breach of contract against the successor, but it is binding in equity on the conscience of any successor who takes with notice of it. He cannot, therefore, eject the licensee in disregard of it. It is an equity within the words of LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., in Tulk v. Moxhay (22) when he said (2 Ph. 778):

“ . . . if an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased.”

In that case a covenant to keep the garden of a London square in its then form was held binding on successors in title who took with notice of the covenant.

Suppose now that there was a covenant, not only to keep the square garden in its then form, but also a covenant to allow the residents of the square to use it. This second covenant is nothing more nor less than a contractual licence to use the garden. But surely both covenants would be held binding on the successors in title. There is no reason in principle to distinguish between them and there is direct authority in favour of it. Eight years after Tulk v. Moxhay (22) a case arose where the owners of a cemetery sold grave spaces to purchasers. These were only contractual licences to use the land for the purposes of burial, but SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., held them to be binding on the successors in title of the licensors: see Moreland v. Richardson (23). So, also, a covenant to permit work to be done on land has been held binding on successors who take with notice because it imports a negative covenant not to interfere with the work: see Andrew v. Aitken (24) (22 Ch.D. 220) per FRY, J., and Sharpe v. Durrant (25) where WARRINGTON, J., said (55 Sol. Jo. 423):

“ . . . this is a case where a person, taking land with notice of an obligation entered into by the previous owner, will be bound in equity to give effect to that obligation.”

These authorities fully support the proposition put forward by SIR JOHN SALMOND in his book on TORTS, 10th ed., p. 246, that a contractual licence to enter on land

"if of such a nature as to be specifically enforceable . . . binds and runs with the land in equity so as to be enforceable not merely against the grantor, but also against all subsequent owners and occupiers of the land except purchasers for value without notice of any such equitable right."

Likewise when the owner of goods agrees to allow another person to use them, as when he lets them out on hire, the agreement is binding not only on the original owner, but also on his successors in title: De Mattos v. Gibson (26), and Lord Strathcona S.S. Co. v. Dominion Coal Co. (27). I know that some people have looked askance at the principles laid down in the Strathcona case (27), but there were, on the Board of the Privy Council, three of the most distinguished equity lawyers of the day, and I fail to see why we should not follow the principles there laid down, at any rate with regard to a contractual licence to use chattels, especially as they are so eminently just and reasonable.

It is, of course, necessary in all these cases that the party who seeks to enforce the contract against a successor in title should have a sufficient interest to warrant the intervention of equity. He must, as the Privy Council put it in the Strathcona case (27) ([1926] A.C. 121),

"have, and continue to have, an interest in the subject-matter of the contract."

This does not mean that he must have a legal estate to be protected. Possession or actual occupation of the land or chattel is sufficient. Thus, in the case of restrictive covenants made for the benefit of adjoining land possession of that adjoining land is sufficient: London County Council v. Allen (28) ([1914] 3 K.B. 672), per SCRUTTON, J. In the case of contractual licences made for the benefit of the occupier of the land actual occupation of that land is sufficient: see Errington v. Errington (10). When a contractual licence to put up advertisements on a wall has been acted on by putting up the advertisements, it is binding on the successors in title of the licensor, including his tenants: see Re Webb (29) per SIR RAYMOND EVERSEED, M.R. ([1951] 2 All E.R. 139), and JENKINS, L.J. (ibid., 145). But a right to put up advertisements on a wall, not yet built, is not binding on the successors in title because that is not itself a licence but only a contract to procure that a licence will be granted in the future: King v. David Allen & Sons, Billposting, Ltd. (30). Likewise in the case of contractual licences to use chattels, entry into possession, once made, is sufficient even though there has been a temporary lack of possession: the Strathcona case (27); but an interest in price restriction is not sufficient: Taddy & Co. v. Sterious & Co. (31).

The only case which gives rise to any difficulty is Clore v. Theatrical Properties, Ltd. & Westby & Co., Ltd. (32), where the licensee of the "front of the house rights" in a theatre, who was in occupation of them, was held to be unable to enforce them against an assignee of the licensor. That case, however, proceeds on the assumption that the licensee had no right which equity could enforce against the licensor: see [1936] 3 All E.R. 490. That assumption is no longer true: see Winter Garden Theatre (London), Ltd. v. Millenium Productions, Ltd. (20) per LORD UTHWATT ([1947] 2 All E.R. 343); and the case may some day have to be re-considered accordingly.

In some contractual licences over land (not amounting to occupation) there may be some nice questions whether the licence is an equitable easement which must be registered to be binding on successors: see an illuminating note on "Equitable Easements" by MR. GEOFFREY CROSS in THE BELL YARD, No. 15, p. 18. But no such questions arise where the licensee is in possession or actual occupation of the land, because that itself is sufficient notice of his rights: see s. 14 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 70 (1) (g) of the Land Registration Act, 1925, and Lewisham Borough Council v. Maloney (33). Statutory tenants (who have only a personal privilege) and requisitioning authorities (who have only possession) do not have to register their interests, nor does a contractual licensee so long as he is in possession or actual occupation. His interest is, therefore, binding on a trustee in bankruptcy, even though the trustee does rank as a purchaser for value: see s. 43 of the Land Registration Act, 1925. I have thus shown, I hope, that equity has reached the same result as the old common lawyers. My conclusion, therefore, is that a contractual licensee, who is in actual occupation of land by virtue of the licence, has an interest which is valid, if not at law at any rate in equity, against the successors in title of the licensor, including therein his trustee in bankruptcy. It is not a legal interest in land, like a tenancy, but a clog or fetter like a lien. It is a personal right, but it is, nevertheless, binding on successors of the licensor, so long as the conditions of the licence are observed.

- A
- The third and last question is whether a deserted wife is in the same position as a contractual licensee. It has been suggested that the husband's right to apply under s. 17 of the Act of 1882 for possession is personal to the husband and does not extend to his successor. Hence it is said that the successor must be able to sue at law for possession because it is inconceivable that he should have no means of getting her out. That was the argument which prevailed with ROXBURGH, J., in Thompson v. Earthy (12), and with the county court judge in the present case. It seems to me, however, that one answer to it may be this: Although an application under s. 17 has to be made in the husband's name, nevertheless, a successor in title can compel the husband to allow his name to be used for the purpose. If the husband sells the house there is an implied assignment by the husband of his right to obtain possession, and equity has always compelled an assignor to allow an action to be brought in his name. So, if the husband becomes bankrupt, the trustee can compel the husband to allow his name to be used for an application under s. 17: see s. 22 (3) and s. 38 (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. Alternatively,
- B
- the trustee in bankruptcy can make an application under s. 105 (1) for an order that the wife do give up possession. In either case the court which deals with the application is enabled under the relevant section to do whatever is just. I must say, however, that, even if a successor cannot compel the husband to apply under s. 17, but the successor has himself to bring an action at law, nevertheless, I should have thought the court would have a discretion whether to
- C
- order possession, for that is the only way in which effect can be given to the wife's right as now established. Any other view would lead to great injustice. It would mean that a guilty husband could transfer the house into the name of his new mistress and then get her to evict his innocent lawful wife from the matrimonial home. No civilised community could tolerate such a cynical disregard of the married state. Equity demands that the successor in title should be in no better
- D
- position than the husband.
- E

- F
- The result of the whole case is that the wife's right to stay in the matrimonial home does not come to an end automatically on the husband's bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy takes subject to equities. He takes, therefore, subject to her right, for it is an equity. The trustee must apply to the court for possession, and the judge who hears the case will take into account the various competing
- G
- interests. He will have regard to the fact that, so far as existing assets are concerned, the general body of creditors have a substantial priority over the wife because they can prove for the debts due to them, but she cannot prove for arrears of maintenance due to her. He will also remember that, so far as the bankrupt's personal earnings are concerned, the wife has a substantial priority over the creditors because the bankrupt has to support his wife and children
- H
- out of his earnings before any of it goes to the creditors. If she is allowed to stay in the matrimonial home she gets less maintenance, and the creditors get more out of his personal earnings. But if she is turned out of the matrimonial home she will be entitled to more maintenance out of his earnings and there will be less available for the creditors. In these circumstances the justice of the case may often be met by allowing the wife to stay in the house temporarily until she finds alternative accommodation, and the court can make appropriate orders to that end.

In the present action the trustee claims that in point of law as soon as the husband became bankrupt the wife became a trespasser and liable for mesne profits. I do not think the claim is well founded. The wife has an equitable right to stay which is binding on the trustee in bankruptcy. He has no absolute right to eject her. It is a matter for the discretion of the court. In my opinion, the appeal should succeed and judgment be entered for the wife.

ROMER, L.J.: The position of a deserted wife who is left by her husband in occupation of the matrimonial home has been considered by the courts lately on a number of occasions. In Errington v. Errington (10) DENNING, L.J., in referring to some of these authorities, said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 155):

" . . . there are numerous cases where a wife who has been deserted by her husband and left by him in the matrimonial home has been held to be, not a tenant of the husband owner . . . nor a bare licensee . . . but to be in a special position—a licensee with a special right—under which the husband cannot turn her out except by an order of the court."

I respectfully adopt this as a correct statement of the position of such a wife. She has no legal or equitable interest in the home which she continues to occupy and in that respect is in no better position than any other licensee. On the other hand, her husband, the licensor, cannot bring proceedings against her in ejectment, for the status of matrimony prevents it. He, accordingly, cannot effectively revoke her licence and in this respect the wife is in a more favourable position than that of an ordinary licensee.

The question is (and it is, I think, a difficult one) whether the special protection which a wife enjoys against ejectment at the instance of her husband avails her against similar action by the husband's trustee in bankruptcy. The plaintiff in the present case argues that it does not, and he says that the wife is trying to create in favour of herself a novel species of interest in property or a new kind of equity, such as the court refused to recognise in Thompson v. Earthy (12). It is common ground that when the debtor was adjudicated bankrupt the whole of his property (with certain irrelevant exceptions) vested in his trustee in bankruptcy and became divisible amongst his creditors: Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 18 (1) and s. 38. "Property" is defined by s. 167 of the Act, and, undoubtedly, included the husband's equity of redemption in the matrimonial home. It is also common ground that in general the trustee takes no better title to the property than the bankrupt had and he takes subject to the same equities as affected the property in the bankrupt's hands. DENNING, L.J., in his judgment has dealt with the latter principle and has expressed the view that the right which the deserted wife enjoyed at the date of her husband's bankruptcy constituted an enforceable equity which operated as a bar to the plaintiff's claim in these proceedings. The same result is arrived at, I think, by approaching the question from a somewhat different angle and I will confine my observations to that approach.

The debtor's right of dealing with the property was subject to the clog or fetter that the house had an occupant whom he could not, of his own volition, eject, and there was, accordingly, to this extent a restriction on his beneficial ownership of the property. If the trustee after the bankruptcy could sue the wife for possession it could only be on the footing that the property vested in him free from this restriction, and it would follow from this that he acquired a larger beneficial interest in the property than that which the debtor had previously enjoyed. It would also follow that a third person automatically lost a special feature attaching to a licence which the debtor had granted for value and was relegated to the position of an ordinary licensee, and that the deterioration of that person's position and the improvement of the trustee's would be commensurate in relation to each other.

Counsel for the plaintiff argued that these were the necessary and natural results of the bankruptcy law. What is vested in the trustee, he said, was the freehold of the property, and (apart from the mortgagee) nobody but the debtor had any legal or equitable interest in that property. The wife's licence depended on her husband's ownership of the property and could not survive the vesting thereof in the trustee. This vesting carried with it (under s. 22 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914) the right to possession and the passing of that right was destructive of licences that had been granted by the debtor previously. In this connection counsel relied on a principle which has been recognised in Brown v. Draper (34) and other cases, namely, that a wife cannot claim the benefit of her husband's statutory tenancy after his interest as statutory tenant has been validly determined. That, of course, is true. Every subordinate interest must perish with the superior interest on which it is dependent. The argument, however, does not appear to me to be convincing. The superior interest in the present case was the ownership of the house and that has not been extinguished. It is still alive and is vested in the trustee. The real point, as I see it, is whether it became so vested subject to or free from a particular incident which was attached to it in the debtor's hands prior to the vesting. If it is now free from the bankrupt's disability to sue the wife for possession, the plaintiff's action must succeed.

This view, however, seems to me to involve a departure from the general rule, to which I have already referred, that a trustee takes no better title to property than the bankrupt had. This rule is fully, and (I think) accurately, stated in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 2, p. 209, as follows:

"The property of the bankrupt passes to the trustee in the same plight and condition in which it was in the bankrupt's hands, and is subject to all the equities and liabilities which affected it in the bankrupt's hands, and to all dispositions which have been validly made by the bankrupt, and to all rights which have been validly acquired by third persons at the commencement of the bankruptcy, unless the property which the trustee takes is released by some express provision of the bankruptcy law."

Examples of such provisions are those relating to fraudulent conveyances and preferences. A licence of the special character which the debtor in the present case created in favour of his wife appears to me to be, at all events, by analogy, prima facie within the general principle as above stated, and I can see no sufficient reason for excluding such a licence from it. In my opinion, accordingly, the trustee is no more entitled than was the debtor prior to his bankruptcy to revoke the wife's licence on his own authority and to sue her for possession of the property. It is said that if the wife's right to possession is binding on the trustee, then the title of the latter to the property is not only not better than that which the debtor had had, but is worse because he cannot, as the husband could have done, apply to the court for possession under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, with the result that the wife can remain in the house without paying rent and without any fear of being dispossessed. As to this counsel for the defendant suggested that an application under s. 17 could still be made either by the husband on the compulsion of the trustee or by the trustee himself by virtue of s. 38 (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the debtor himself being made a party to the application. I doubt this. Section 17 provides in effect that on the application of either a husband or wife the court may, in any question that arises between them, make orders as to the title to or possession of property. Theoretically the trustee might be able to compel the husband to apply: s. 22 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, but apart from the unsatisfactory nature of such a procedure the application could scarcely be regarded as one made in a question between husband and wife, for the issue would in substance be between the husband's creditors, on the one hand, and the wife, on the other. This comment would be equally true of an application made by the trustee in bankruptcy, and, further, such an application would not be by the husband even though he were made a party to it.

I confess, accordingly, that I entertain some doubt whether the jurisdiction of the court under s. 17 could be invoked. On the other hand, if the defendant were to persist in remaining in possession without payment of rent, or if no other arrangement agreeable both to her and to the trustee can be arrived at, I see no reason why the matter should not be resolved in the bankruptcy proceedings under s. 105 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. It is well settled that under that provision the bankruptcy court has power to determine questions affecting persons who are not parties to the bankruptcy, and, in my opinion, it would be well within the powers of the court, on a motion by the trustee, to decide whether the defendant should be permitted to remain in occupation of what was the matrimonial home, and if so on what terms, or whether she should be required to deliver up possession. On such an application the court would doubtless take into account all the matters that would be relevant to the exercise of the discretion conferred by s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and, in particular, the fact that the wife cannot prove in the bankruptcy for payments due under the maintenance order and that the magistrates in making that order almost certainly regarded the wife's right to occupy the house as relevant to the amount which they directed her husband to pay. If, as I believe, the matter could be dealt with in this way, the wife's position in relation to the property would be substantially the same as it was before her husband's bankruptcy and the trustee would, in effect, succeed to the position of the debtor.

For the reasons that I have tried to express I am unable to agree with the learned judge that the trustee was competent to sue the defendant for possession, and accordingly this appeal, in my judgment, should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: T. D. Jones & Co., agents for Lyon Clark & Co., Smethwick (for the defendant); Bentleys, Stokes & Lowless, agents for Turner, Bayley & Co., Dudley (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

UTTOXETER URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. CLARKE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Lloyd-Jacob, J.), April 24, 28, 29, 1952.]

Housing—Compulsory purchase order—Acquisition of dwelling-house as part of estate—Duty of acquiring authority to convert house for housing purposes—Housing Act, 1936 (c. 51), s. 79 (4).

Compulsory Purchase—Application to quash order—Expiration of time allowed for application—Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946 (c. 49), sched. I, para. 16.

In October, 1946, a local authority made a compulsory purchase order under the Housing Act, 1936, s. 73, in relation to the H. estate, the order being confirmed by the Minister after a local inquiry. The H. estate comprised a large dwelling-house and out-buildings, together with grounds of some seven and a half acres. After acquiring possession, the local authority permitted the S. county council to use part of the house and themselves used the rest of the premises for the provision of facilities for dental services and welfare work.

HELD: (i) section 79 (4) of the Act of 1936 was directed to the instance where a local authority acquired a house for conversion and not to a case in which the house was acquired as part of an estate to be used as a site for the erection of houses, and, therefore, it was not incumbent on the local authority by virtue of s. 79 (4) "forthwith . . . to secure the alteration, enlargement, repair or improvement" needed to make the dwelling-house suitable for housing purposes.

(ii) no application having been made to the High Court within the period prescribed by the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1936, sched. I, para. 15, the validity of the compulsory purchase order, having regard to para. 16 of the said schedule, could not be questioned.

A FOR THE HOUSING ACT, 1936, s. 79 (4), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 520.

ACTION.

B The Uttoxeter Urban District Council claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from remaining on or re-entering certain premises, namely, Heath House estate, consisting of Heath House together with some seven and a half acres of land and a dwelling-house and curtilage, known as No. 90, Cheadle Road, which the council had acquired by virtue of a compulsory purchase order made under Part V of the Housing Act, 1936, and confirmed by the Minister of Health. Only the first defendant, William Clarke, appeared. In 1935 the first defendant who then lived at No. 90, Cheadle Road, urged the council to purchase for housing purposes Heath House estate, which was being offered for sale. The council not being minded to buy the estate, the first defendant himself acquired it and endeavoured to obtain planning permission to develop it as a private housing estate. Heath House estate was almost surrounded by housing property owned by the council. After the first defendant had acquired the property, he several times gave the council an opportunity of purchasing the property from him. Later he converted Heath House into a private hotel, went to live there, and managed it with his family. In 1945 the council decided to acquire the property, and, as the negotiations with the first defendant failed, the council gave notice of its intention to acquire the estate compulsorily. In October, 1946, a compulsory purchase order was made, and, after a local inquiry at which the first defendant appeared, the Minister confirmed the order. The first defendant did not apply to the High Court under para. 15 of sched. I, to the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, and he took no part in the proceedings for the assessment of the value of the estate which was assessed at £8,000 which amount represented, according to the first defendant, only a fraction of its value. In April, 1947, notice to treat, and in May, 1950, notice of entry were given. The first defendant refused to quit the estate, and in July, 1950, he was evicted under a warrant issued by the sheriff under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 91. Shortly afterwards the first defendant re-entered the land. On Aug. 8, 1950, DONOVAN, J., granted an interlocutory injunction which the first defendant obeyed. The council had not used the land for housing purposes, and Heath House was not converted to provide housing accommodation but was used for purposes of the Staffordshire County Council and to provide dental facilities. No. 90, Cheadle Road remained in the occupation of the tenant to whom the first defendant had let the property.

W. L. Roots for the plaintiffs, Uttoxeter Urban District Council.

The first defendant, William Clarke, appeared in person.

The other defendants, a daughter and son-in-law of the first defendant, did not appear and were not represented.

H LLOYD-JACOB, J.: The plaintiffs seek to protect a possessory title which they claim in a property known as Heath House, together with some seven and a half acres of land in which it stands, a dwelling-house, No. 90, Cheadle Road, in its immediate vicinity, and certain other buildings and appurtenances thereunto belonging, which possessory title they claim is properly founded on the Uttoxeter Urban District (Heath House Estate) Compulsory Purchase Order, 1946, made under the Housing Act, 1936, and the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, which was confirmed by the Minister. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The compulsory purchase order purports to be an exercise by the council of rights arising under the Housing Act, 1936, Part V, in respect of the land and properties which are identified in the map attached to the order. The main burden of the first defendant's complaint is that the order is one which this court should not permit to be enforced because the purpose for which it was sought was not in fact intended to be attained by the purchase and has not been attained having regard to the way in which the council have made use of the property since they acquired possession of it. That view proceeds on a misapprehension of the Housing Act, 1936, and, therefore, it is desirable that I should make reference to the powers and duties which are cast on local authorities by Part V of that Act. It is to be noted that by s. 71 the local authority is charged with the duty of surveying the housing conditions in the district with a view to preparing and submitting to the Minister proposals for securing the satisfactory housing of persons within the area. By s. 73 the local authority is granted power (a) to acquire land, including any houses or buildings thereon, as a site for the erection of houses, and (b) to acquire houses or other buildings which are or, by conversion may be made, suitable for housing purposes and for other purposes set out in the section. By s. 79 it is provided that local authorities who have acquired any land for the purposes of this Part of the Act may do certain acts in connection with property so acquired. It is interesting to note that those specific provisions are expressed to be without prejudice to any powers that the local authority may have under the remainder of the Act. By s. 79 (4) it is provided that where a local authority acquire a house or other building which can be made suitable by conversion for housing purposes it shall forthwith proceed to secure by alteration, enlargement, repair, improvement or adaptation that it is so fitted.

The first defendant's submission is, as I understand it, that because Heath House itself is a building on the land compulsorily acquired there is an obligation resting on the council under s. 79 (4) forthwith to secure, by alteration, enlargement, repair, improvement or adaptation, that it should be converted into suitable dwellings. That submission, in my judgment, is erroneous. As I read the section, it is directed to the instance where the local authority acquires a house for conversion, and it is by no means obligatory in respect of houses which are acquired as part of an estate. Accordingly, I do not think it right to infer that the failure of the council to convert Heath House into suitable dwellings is in itself an indication that the avowed purpose of their acquisition, viz., that it was to be for the purposes of Part V of the Housing Act, 1936, was erroneous.

In the course of his submissions the first defendant developed an argument based on the undoubted right of a citizen of this country to be permitted to retain his own property except when deprived of it by due process of law. That is a principle which I trust this court will always use its best endeavours to secure, and there is nothing contrary to any of the foundations of our great right in the present proceedings unless it appears that the acquisition of this property compulsorily is not in accordance with the law of this country. It is, perhaps, desirable, seeing that the first defendant appeared in person, that I should indicate the proper approach to a matter of that sort. It is the fact that, with the appreciation of the importance of safeguarding the public interest, as time has gone on it has become necessary for private rights to be made subservient to the public interest, and the statute book contains a number of instances where private rights are open to question and in some cases to acquisition where they conflict with an overriding public interest. This compulsory purchase order is an instance of that general attitude. Whereas here the requirements for the housing of the persons in this urban district in truth justifies the acquisition of property so as to provide that housing, then persons who are fortunate enough to own property suitable for that purpose may find themselves in a position to discharge their public duty and at the same time to receive compensation for their property by following the procedure laid down for the acquisition of housing estates.

A Counsel for the council made a submission based on the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, under which the Minister operated in the present case. By para. 15 of sched. I to that Act, provision is made for the steps to be taken by any person who regards himself aggrieved by a compulsory purchase order. It is provided that, if any person desires to question the validity of a compulsory purchase order or of any provision in it, he must make an application to the High Court, and it is provided that that must be within six weeks from the date on which either the making of the order or the notice of confirmation is first published, and in the present case there is no question that that period of time has long since expired. The Act further provides, in para. 16, that

B "Subject to the provisions of the last foregoing paragraph, a compulsory purchase order . . . shall not, either before or after it has been confirmed, . . . be questioned in any legal proceedings whatsoever, and shall become operative on the date on which notice is first published as mentioned in the last foregoing paragraph."

C In its wisdom, Parliament appears to have decided that the provision of a limited period within which the action of the authority and Minister can be questioned before the courts is a suitable procedure in cases such as the present, and if Her Majesty's lieges do not adopt the procedure laid down by Parliament they cannot seriously suggest that they are suffering any injustice if, having

D laid by and let the time run out, they then seek to develop an argument against the propriety of the order. I hold that, having regard to the terms of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, it is not open in the present proceedings for this court to go behind the order as it was made and confirmed, but again, although I hold that view, it is desirable in a case where the defendant is appearing in person that I should indicate the opinion I have formed as a

E result of listening to the evidence and his submissions on it. Had it been open to me to go behind the form of this order and to investigate the propriety of the representations it contains as to the purpose for which this property was sought to be acquired, I should myself have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that it was a perfectly genuine order. It appears that since they came into possession of the property, the council have not built houses on the land, nor

F have they converted the main house, and, indeed, the only conversion they appear to have made is to remove the possibility of living accommodation in certain of the outbuildings by constructing garages for ambulances and the like. It is submitted that that is abundant evidence that the suggestion that the property was acquired for the purposes of the Housing Act, 1936, is completely misconceived. I have already expressed my view as to the fallacy in the argument

G under the Housing Act, 1936, that the acquisition of an estate on which there is a house or other buildings necessarily requires the local authority to convert that house or building immediately into dwellings. Apart altogether from the fact that changing circumstances, acquisition of other properties in the neighbourhood, and the like, may well have caused alteration in the immediate needs of the local authority, I am satisfied that, had it been necessary, the council could

H have proved that their avowed purpose in the purchase of this property had been made out.

Injunction granted.

Solicitors: Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co., agents for F. S. Hawthorn & Son, Uttoxeter (for the council).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

CHILTON v. CHILTON.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), April 23, 1952.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance order—Wilful neglect to maintain—Reasonable and honest belief of wife's adultery.

As a result of quarrels over the wife's relationship with another man, the husband turned the wife out of the matrimonial home. On the wife's summonses against the husband charging him with desertion and wilful neglect to provide her with reasonable maintenance, HELD: the husband's bona fide belief, induced by the wife, that she had committed adultery was a good defence, not only to the charge of desertion, but also to the charge of wilful neglect to maintain.

Morris v. Edmonds (1897) (77 L.T. 56) and Glenister v. Glenister ([1945] 1 All E.R. 513), applied.

AS TO WILFUL NEGLECT TO MAINTAIN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 838, para. 1340; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 558, 559, Nos. 6134-6150.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Glenister v. Glenister, [1945] 1 All E.R. 513; [1945] P. 30; 114 L.J.P. 69; 172 L.T. 250; 109 J.P. 194; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Everitt v. Everitt, [1949] 1 All E.R. 908; [1949] P. 374; 113 J.P. 279; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Allen v. Allen, [1951] 1 All E.R. 724; 115 J.P. 229.
- (4) Haswell v. Haswell & Sanderson, (1859), 1 Sw. & Tr. 502; 29 L.J.P. & M. 21; 1 L.T. 69; 23 J.P. 825; 164 E.R. 832; 27 Digest 373, 3609.
- (5) Ousey v. Ousey & Atkinson, (1874), L.R. 3 P. & D. 223; 43 L.J.P. & M. 35; 30 L.T. 911; subsequent proceedings (1875), 1 P.D. 56; 45 L.J.P. 33; 33 L.T. 789; 27 Digest 322, 3004.
- (6) Morris v. Edmonds, (1897), 77 L.T. 56; 37 Digest 358, 1609.
- (7) Biggs v. Burridge, (1924), 89 J.P. 75; 37 Digest 360, 1623.

APPEAL by the husband against a decision of Barrow-in-Furness, Lancashire, justices whereby they found him guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife. At the same time and on the same facts they dismissed a summons by the wife alleging that the husband had also been guilty of desertion on the ground that on that part of the case they were bound by the decision in Glenister v. Glenister (1) ([1945] 1 All E.R. 513).

John Latey for the husband.

A. R. Ellis for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is an appeal by a husband against a decision of the justices for the Barrow-in-Furness petty sessional division of Lancashire given on Dec. 21, 1951, whereby they found him guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife. On that finding they made an order for 10s. a week, which, so far as amount is concerned, is not challenged. At the same time they dismissed the wife's charge, in respect of the same circumstances, that the husband had deserted her. The sole question in this case, therefore, is whether the finding of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance can stand.

The case raises the question whether or not the principles on which Glenister v. Glenister (1) was decided apply, not only to a charge of desertion, but also to one of wilful neglect to maintain. Having regard to the helpful way in which this case has been presented to us on both sides, it is not necessary to go into an elaborate review of the facts. The husband resisted the summonses on the ground that his wife had committed adultery, though it is conceded that no formal charge had been made to that effect and she had been given no formal notice of the charge. The case was fought on the basis that, whether, in fact, she had committed adultery or not, by her conduct she had induced a reasonable belief in the husband's mind that she had done so, and I propose to deal with the case on that basis. The justices have found that there was not sufficient evidence that the wife had committed adultery, and I see no reason whatever for interfering with that finding. On the other hand, it is agreed by both counsel that the case, at any rate so far as desertion was concerned, came within the Glenister v. Glenister (1) principle, namely, that she had induced a reasonable belief in the husband's mind that she had committed adultery. On that they found that the husband, who had, in effect, turned her out of the matrimonial home as the result of a quarrel over her supposed relationship with a certain man, was not guilty of desertion without reasonable cause, but at the same time they held that the conduct of the wife was not such as to absolve the husband from his liability to maintain her, and, therefore, that he was not justified in refusing to provide reasonable maintenance for her. Accordingly, they dismissed the one summons and found the other proved. It is also agreed that this case must be judged as things stood at the time when the summonses came before the justices and before they had found that there was not sufficient evidence of adultery having been committed. Both counsel, I think rightly, have pressed us to decide the question as a strict matter of law on the facts which I have outlined and not to be diverted from doing so by the possibility that the very finding itself may or may not render the question of the husband's liability to maintain his wife for the future purely academic.

Before I examine the law I must mention one other circumstance. I am satisfied that the justices were entitled to hold that as regards the charge of desertion this case was governed by Glenister v. Glenister (1), and to direct themselves accordingly. Without an elaborate examination of the evidence, I think it is sufficient to say that it is plain that to the knowledge of the husband and in defiance of his wishes the wife had been associating with the man in question and that when the last quarrel took place about this association she assumed a thoroughly defiant attitude. She threw what turned out eventually to be merely a pay-packet at him, saying: "There is the evidence you want—French letters". Not only so, but when he suggested a reconciliation she said that she intended to go away with this man, and she also admitted that she had confessed what she was pleased to call her "guilt" to his son, though she tried in the witness box to qualify that by saying that that only meant guilt in associating with him and not guilt in committing adultery. I think it is unnecessary to say more than that the evidence does clearly show this to be the class of case in which by her own conduct the wife deliberately induced in the husband's mind the belief in her guilt.

The question is whether, in spite of their correct decision about desertion the justices were entitled to hold on the same set of circumstances that the husband wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife. It is true that so far as the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) statutory code is concerned, all the decisions on this point relate to the offence of desertion and none of them to wilful neglect to maintain, but I have had some difficulty in understanding why, in circumstances such as those prevailing in this case, there should be thought to be any logical distinction between the two. It is not, as was at one time suggested in argument, a question whether reasonable belief in the wife's having committed adultery absolves the husband for all time from maintaining his wife, but whether, during a period when the husband reasonably holds the belief in his wife's adultery which has been induced, and, as in this case, deliberately induced, by her own conduct, he can be charged with wilful neglect to maintain her.

I do not propose to review all the authorities. I think it is sufficient for our purposes to say that Glenister v. Glenister (1) has now been dealt with twice in the Court of Appeal, once—(I have to utter the caution)—by the author of the original judgment presiding in the Court of Appeal in Everitt v. Everitt (2). In Allen v. Allen (3) HODSON, L.J., said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 728) :

" Glenister v. Glenister (1) was referred to by LORD MERRIMAN, P., sitting as President of a division of this court in Everitt v. Everitt (2), and he there emphasised what is, in my judgment, an essential feature of the defence which the husband sought to raise in the present case, namely, its temporary nature, because, although at one moment a person may be able to say that he or she reasonably believes in a state of facts, that reasonable belief may be dispelled at any moment. Nobody could give an exhaustive statement of the ways in which a belief could be dispelled. The question in issue in the present case is whether the husband's belief must be taken to have been dispelled when a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction has been given in favour of the wife to the effect that the husband has failed to prove a charge of adultery against her."

That is the case as it stands now, but it was not the case as it stood before the justices gave their judgment. Then HODSON, L.J., refers to my judgment in Everitt v. Everitt (2) and quotes from it one passage ([1949] 1 All E.R. 913) which I shall not cite again.

In the judgment in Glenister v. Glenister (1) I am reported as having said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 517):

" That brings me to the only remaining point, which is the real crux of this case: Whether, short of proving adultery against the wife, the husband has nevertheless shown and ought to be held to have shown that he had reasonable cause for withdrawing from cohabitation in the sense that he was not a deserter . . . That the husband held that belief, and held it reasonably, I am prepared to hold in his favour. There remains the sole question whether that is enough. My own impression is that there is authority on the question of reasonable belief of adultery, but I cannot put my hand on it, and counsel have not been able to refer us to it, but the principle, I think, is really settled by two cases."

I then refer to Haswell v. Haswell & Sanderson (4) and Ousey v. Ousey & Atkinson (5) and I do not propose to refer to them again, but I am now able to say that I know what were the cases the names of which I was trying to recall. They were Morris v. Edmonds (6), and Biggs v. Burridge (7), the latter of which approves, but distinguishes, Morris v. Edmonds (6). I think it is only necessary to refer to Morris v. Edmonds (6), and I do so because, although it was decided under the Vagrancy Act, in substance it raises exactly the point which is said to be left undecided by Glenister v. Glenister (1) and all the other cases in which Glenister v. Glenister (1) has been followed. In Morris v. Edmonds (6) the head-note reads as follows:

" The respondent . . . was charged under s. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, for that he, being able to work and maintain himself and his wife and family, ' wilfully refused or neglected ' to do so. The magistrates found that he refused to maintain his wife because of the bona fide belief that she had committed adultery, and that he had offered under certain conditions to support his children. They dismissed the summons, holding that under these circumstances . . . the respondent, had not ' wilfully refused or neglected '. Held, that the magistrates were right."

The Vagrancy Act, in common with s. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, imports the element of wilfulness. It might be well just to read one paragraph in the Case stated by the magistrates for the Queen's Bench Divisional Court (77 L.T. 56):

" Upon the facts hereinbefore stated we decided that this was a case of bona fide mutual separation by deed, and that the respondent had at the time of separation made provision for his wife and her children, and had ceased to pay her in consequence of a bona fide belief that she had committed adultery, and that the respondent had not within the true meaning and intent of the Vagrancy Act wilfully refused or neglected to maintain his wife and children, and that he therefore was not guilty of the offence charged against him by the summons, which we therefore dismissed."

A It was argued that while the committal of adultery had been held to be a defence, there was no direct authority that bona fide belief of adultery amounted to a defence. The court consisted of COLLINS, J., and RIDLEY, J., and the judgment was delivered by COLLINS, J., who said (ibid., 57):

B "I am of opinion that we ought not to interfere with the discretion of the magistrates. They heard and saw the parties, and came to a conclusion that this was bona fide. I was impressed at one time with the distinction of the fact of adultery, and the bona fide belief of adultery, but this is a proceeding not to enforce maintenance, but a penal proceeding for an offence, and so we must look and see if the respondent has 'wilfully' refused to maintain. The authorities quoted establish that under the circumstances of this case, the man cannot be described as an idle and disorderly person. I think the decision of the magistrates perfectly right, and this appeal must be dismissed."

C I agree that that is not directly in point because of such distinction as there is between the provisions of the Vagrancy Act and those of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts, but it seems to me to be a very strong indication, even if there were no other, to what our decision ought to be in regard to this charge of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance. But for my part, I think that in the circumstances of this case it is impossible to draw any sensible distinction between the application of the principle in Glenister v. Glenister (1) and the cases which followed and approved it to the charge of desertion and the application of that principle to the charge of wilful neglect to maintain. I think, therefore, that, though the findings of fact on the justices' part are unimpeachable, they have misdirected themselves in the application of the law to those facts in respect of the summons for wilful neglect, and that the appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

D PEARCE, J.: I agree. The principle laid down in Glenister v. Glenister (1) is decisive of this case. In view of the circumstances which led the justices, quite rightly, to dismiss the summons for desertion, it was not possible for them properly to find that there had been wilful neglect to maintain. Unless there is some agreement, made expressly or by implication between the parties, the duty to cohabit and the duty to maintain are co-extensive, and, in my opinion, where circumstances have excused the husband from his duty to cohabit he cannot be held guilty of wilful neglect to maintain.

E F Appeal allowed.
Solicitors: Baylis, Pearce & Co. (for the husband); Bell, Brodrick & Gray (for the wife).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

PRIDE OF DERBY & DERBYSHIRE ANGLING ASSOCIATION, LTD. AND ANOTHER v. BRITISH CELANESE, LTD. AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), February 12, 13, 14, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, March 31, April 7, 1952.]

Nuisance—Pollution of river—Nuisance arising from acts of several persons—Action against three defendants—Actionable wrong committed by one defendant—Liability of remaining defendants.

Water and Watercourses—Pollution of river—Untreated sewage matter—Action by riparian owners against local authority—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876 (c. 75), s. 3—Derby Corporation Act, 1901 (c. cclxvii), s. 109 (1), s. 113.

Electricity Supply—Right to abstract water from river—Water returned in heated condition—Injury to fish—Rights of Earl of Harrington “as riparian owner . . . upon the river”—Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929 (c. lxxxvi), s. 37 (1), s. 37 (2).

Injunction—Local authority unable to comply with injunction without financial grant.

The plaintiffs were severally entitled to rights in respect of the bed, banks and water of the rivers Derwent and Trent from below the confluence of the rivers to Borrowash Bridge on the river Derwent, about seven miles above the confluence. On the banks of the Derwent below Derby and above the plaintiffs' waters were works maintained by the defendants. Immediately after passing Derby the river was in a reasonably pure state and supported game fish, but before reaching Borrowash Bridge, owing to the activities of the defendants, it was polluted to such an extent that it was foul and black and contained little or no fish. The pollution was caused (a) by effluent consisting of sewage matter, insufficiently treated and discharged into the river from the sewage works of the second defendants, Derby Corporation, and (b) heated effluent, containing suspended organic matter, discharged into the river from the works of the first defendant, a company. The damage and danger resulting from the pollution were aggravated by the rise in the temperature of the water caused by large quantities of heated effluent which were discharged into the river from the generating station of the third defendants, the British Electricity Authority. The water which was discharged into the river from the works of the first defendant and the electricity authority had, in each case, been extracted from the river. In an action by the plaintiffs claiming, inter alia, (a) an injunction restraining each of the defendants from causing or permitting the pollution of the plaintiffs' waters, and (b) an injunction restraining the first defendant and the electricity authority from causing or permitting an alteration in the temperature of the plaintiffs' waters, the first defendant admitted liability, but the corporation and the electricity authority each denied liability and relied on their statutory rights and powers. The generating station had been set up and maintained under the powers conferred on the electricity authority's predecessor by the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Acts, 1901 and 1929, and the electricity authority relied on (inter alia) s. 37 (1) of the Act of 1929.

HELD: (i) the plaintiffs, as riparian owners, were entitled to sue in respect of the injury done to their rights in the river; as their waters had been polluted by the combined effect of the activities of the defendants, they were entitled to bring an action against all the defendants; and, even if neither the corporation nor the electricity authority had individually committed an actionable wrong, they were not relieved of liability notwithstanding that the first defendant had admitted liability and could be sued alone.

Thorpe v. Brumfitt (1873) (8 Ch. App. 650), applied.

(ii) as the proviso to s. 113 of the Derby Corporation Act, 1901, expressly stated that the corporation were not authorised to construct any works or do any other thing in contravention of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, and as it was an offence under s. 3 of the Act of 1876 to cause any solid or liquid sewage matter to fall or flow into any stream, the corporation were not authorised by the Act of 1901 to send untreated sewage matter into the river, and, in so far as their action in doing so was a nuisance, it was forbidden by s. 109 (1) of the Act of 1901; the application of s. 109 (1) was not limited to the inhabitants of Spondon, notwithstanding that the marginal note to the section was "For protection of parish of Spondon"; as the plaintiffs' claim against the corporation was founded on misfeasance and not on non-feasance, they had established a good cause of action against the corporation, and the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 299, did not apply to them; the provision in the proviso to s. 113 of the Act of 1901 that compensation by arbitration was the only remedy did not apply to the damage suffered by the plaintiffs, as it was expressed to apply only to damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers of that section, viz., the power to divert streams and deal with waters so intercepted.

(iii) on the true construction of s. 37 (1) of the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929, the electricity authority were authorised to abstract water from the river only so long as they complied with the proviso to the sub-section, whereby they were directed to return the water in such a condition as not to cause injury to fish, and, as they had failed to comply with the proviso and the plaintiffs had suffered damage through their failure to do so, the plaintiffs had established a good cause of action against them.

(iv) the reference to the rights of the Earl of Harrington "as riparian owner . . . upon the river", in s. 37 (2) of the Act of 1929, was not limited to the earl's riparian rights in the reach with which s. 37 dealt, but protected any riparian rights that he might have on the river.

(v) the fact that Derby Corporation could not remedy the wrong suffered by the plaintiffs at their hands without financial assistance which they could only obtain on the authority of the Minister of Health, and that, therefore, compliance with the injunction depended on matters outside their control, was no reason for not granting an injunction against them, nor was an award of damages alone proper compensation for damage of the nature caused.

Damage—Apportionment—Inquiry as to damages—Apportionment of damage by court prior to inquiry.

The court, having ordered an inquiry as to damages in respect of nuisance and trespass, was asked by the defendants to apportion the damage between them. The defendants submitted that they were not joint tortfeasors, but were severally liable to the plaintiffs for a tort.

HELD: although it might well be convenient to the plaintiffs on the inquiry that each of the defendants should be regarded as wholly responsible, that was not sufficient ground for not apportioning the damages, and it was proper that they should be apportioned.

Croston v. Vaughan ([1937] 4 All E.R. 249), applied.

AS TO REMEDIES FOR POLLUTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 33, pp. 609-612, paras. 1072-1078; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 45-50, Nos. 321-355.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Young (John) & Co. v. Bankier Distillery Co., [1893] A.C. 691; 69 L.T. 838; 58 J.P. 100; 44 Digest 13, 54.

- (2) Pennington v. Brinsop Hall Coal Co., (1877), 5 Ch.D. 769; 46 L.J.Ch. 773; 37 L.T. 149; sub nom. Fennington v. Brinsop Hall Coal Co., 41 J.P. 758; 44 Digest 57, 410.
- (3) Nicholls v. Ely Beet Sugar Factory, Ltd., [1936] Ch. 343; 105 L.J.Ch. 279; 154 L.T. 531; Digest Supp.
- (4) Fitzgerald v. Firbank, [1897] 2 Ch. 96; 66 L.J.Ch. 529; 76 L.T. 584; 25 Digest 4, 4.
- (5) Smith v. Kemp, (1693), Carth. 285 (90 E.R. 769); Holt, K.B. 322 (90 E.R. 1078); 2 Salk. 637 (91 E.R. 537); 4 Mod. Rep. 186 (87 E.R. 340); Skin. 342 (90 E.R. 152); 25 Digest 33, 318.
- (6) Blair & Sumner v. Deakin, Eden & Thwaites v. Deakin, (1887), 57 L.T. 522; 52 J.P. 327; 44 Digest 38, 271.
- (7) Thorpe v. Brumfitt, (1873), 8 Ch.App. 650; 37 J.P. 742; 36 Digest 215, 576.
- (8) Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban Council, [1898] A.C. 387; 67 L.J.Q.B. 635; 78 L.T. 569; 62 J.P. 628; 38 Digest 154, 38.
- (9) Glossop v. Heston & Isleworth Local Board, (1879), 12 Ch.D. 102; 49 L.J.Ch. 89; 40 L.T. 736; 44 J.P. 36; 38 Digest 42, 249.
- (10) A.-G. v. Dorking Guardians, (1882), 20 Ch.D. 595; 51 L.J.Ch. 585; 46 L.T. 573; 38 Digest 54, 310.
- (11) Robinson v. Workington Corpn., [1897] 1 Q.B. 619; 66 L.J.Q.B. 388; 75 L.T. 674; 61 J.P. 164; 38 Digest 55, 318.
- (12) Hesketh v. Birmingham Corpn., [1924] 1 K.B. 260; 93 L.J.K.B. 461; 130 L.T. 476; 88 J.P. 77; 38 Digest 48, 280.
- (13) Jones v. Llanrwst Urban Council, [1911] 1 Ch. 393; 80 L.J.Ch. 145; 103 L.T. 751; 75 J.P. 68; 38 Digest 45, 263.
- (14) Rylands v. Fletcher, (1868), L.R. 3 H.L. 330; 37 L.J.Ex. 161; 19 L.T. 220; 33 J.P. 70; 36 Digest 187, 311.
- (15) Haigh v. Deudraeth Rural District Council, [1945] 2 All E.R. 661; 174 L.T. 243; 110 J.P. 97; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (16) Harrington (Earl) v. Derby Corpn., [1905] 1 Ch. 205; 74 L.J.Ch. 219; 92 L.T. 153; 69 J.P. 62; 44 Digest 58, 418.
- (17) Manchester Corpn. v. Farnworth, [1930] A.C. 171; 99 L.J.K.B. 83; 94 J.P. 62; sub nom. Farnworth v. Manchester Corpn., 142 L.T. 145; Digest Supp.
- (18) Croston v. Vaughan, [1937] 4 All E.R. 249; [1938] 1 K.B. 540; 107 L.J.K.B. 182; 158 L.T. 221; 102 J.P. 11; Digest Supp.

ACTION for, inter alia, (i) an injunction restraining each of the defendants from causing or permitting any effluent to flow or pass from the premises of such defendant at Spondon, in the county of Derby, into the river Derwent so as to pollute (either by itself or in combination with any effluent discharged into such river by any of the other defendants or any other persons) the waters of (a) the river Derwent where they flowed past or over the lands below Borrowash Bridge and above the confluence of that river with the river Trent, where the first plaintiff was owner of the bed thereof or of a several fishery therein, and the second plaintiff was owner of the banks or bank thereof, or (b) of the river Trent immediately below its confluence with the river Derwent, where the first plaintiff was owner of a several fishery therein, or entitled as tenant to a right of fishing, and the second plaintiff was owner of the banks or bank thereof; (ii) an injunction restraining the first defendant, British Celanese, Ltd., or the third defendants, British Electricity Authority (East Midlands Division), from causing or permitting any effluent to flow or pass from their respective premises at Spondon into the river Derwent so as perceptibly to alter (either by itself or in combination with any other effluents discharged into such river by any of the other defendants or any other person) the temperature of the waters of the river where they flowed past or over any of the plaintiffs' premises; (iii) a mandatory injunction against the second defendants, Derby Corporation, ordering them to dismantle and remove the outfall for crude sewage into the river Derwent maintained by them; (iv) damages in trespass and nuisance against all the defendants.

At the date of the issue of the writ, another effluent was discharged into the river by the fourth defendant, Midland Tar Distilleries, Ltd., but the fourth defendant ceased the discharge and proceedings against it were stayed under an order, dated Nov. 4, 1951. At the trial, the claim to a mandatory injunction against the corporation was abandoned.

Each of the defendants maintained works on or near the banks of the river Derwent near Spondon, up-stream of the plaintiffs' waters and below Derby. After leaving Derby and immediately below Raynesway Bridge, the river took three loops to the north. On the north bank of the first loop, the corporation had constructed sewage works under powers conferred on them by the Derby Corporation Act, 1901. The works had been extended under the Derby Corporation Act, 1930, but they were now inadequate, and sewage matter which was insufficiently treated was discharged into the river. In particular, in times of sudden storm or flood, untreated sewage passed direct into the river at two storm water outfalls (called the A outfall and the C outfall). On the second loop of the river were the first defendant's works. About fifty-four million gallons of water were taken daily into the first defendant's lagoons and some of this water was returned to the river in a heated and extremely foul condition. On the third loop (and nearest to the plaintiffs' waters) were an electric generating station and works, which were constructed under the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Acts, 1901 and 1929, and were now vested in and maintained by the third defendants, British Electricity Authority, under the Electricity Act, 1947. To cool their condensers, the electricity authority took about 120 million gallons of water daily from the river, and, as the water was already foul when it reached the generating station, a small quantity of chlorine was infused into it at the intake to neutralise the damage which it would otherwise do to the machinery. After use, the greater part of this water was returned to the river at a greatly increased temperature.

Immediately after leaving Derby the river was in a reasonably clean condition, but by the time it reached the plaintiffs' waters, it was heated and extremely foul and could not sustain fish life. Shortly before the hearing of the action, the first defendant admitted that its activities polluted the stream to the detriment of the plaintiffs and submitted to some form of relief by way of injunction. The corporation and the electricity authority each denied liability and each contended that their own activities were not sufficient to cause a nuisance. The corporation further contended, inter alia, that, if a nuisance arose from their works, they were absolved as they were under a statutory duty to do the things which created a nuisance. The electricity authority contended, inter alia, that it was empowered by s. 37 (1) of the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929, to abstract water from the river and use it in the way in which it did.

Russell, Q.C., and Newsom for the plaintiffs, Pride of Derby and Derbyshire Angling Association, Ltd., and the Earl of Harrington.

Milner Holland, Q.C., and Teague for the first defendant, British Celanese, Ltd.

Sir Andrew Clark, Q.C., and Hesketh for the second defendants, Derby Corporation.

Salt, Q.C., H. I. Willis and S. I. Levy for the third defendants, British Electricity Authority.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 31. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiff association is the owner or occupier of a fishery on the rivers Trent and Derwent at a point round about their confluence and running up the latter river some six miles. The association also owns the south bank of the river Derwent at two points where it has fishing rights. The second plaintiff is riparian owner of a considerable stretch of both rivers, the part here material consisting of about seven miles of water beginning slightly below their confluence and running up the Derwent to a bridge known as Borrowash Bridge. The plaintiffs claim relief by way of injunction against each of the defendants who, as they allege, by their several activities (carried on in close proximity to one another above Borrowash Bridge) pollute the plaintiffs' waters and the banks of the rivers. As against the first defendant, British Celanese, Ltd., and the third defendants, British Electricity Authority (hereafter referred to as the power company), there is an additional claim based on the allegation that their respective activities raise the temperature of the river. There are also claims for damages laid both in trespass and in nuisance.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and found (a) that the Derby Corporation's effluent at the point of discharge was a polluting effluent the discharge of which could not be justified; that, in the polluted state of the river at all places below the entry of the corporation's effluent, it was not possible for the ill-effects to wear off; and that the corporation had added substantially to the state of things of which the plaintiffs complained; and (b) that the raising of the temperature of the water by the power company was harmful to fish, and that the activities of the electricity authority, in the state of the river, contributed substantially to the harm which was being done to the plaintiffs. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] If these be the facts, what is the law applicable? I find this well stated in COULSON AND FORBES ON WATERS, 2nd ed., p. 159 [5th ed., p. 172], in these words:

"A riparian proprietor on a natural stream has a right to the flow of the stream through or by his land in its natural state as an incident to the land through or by which it flows, and if the water be polluted, so as to occasion damage in law, though not in fact, it gives him a good cause of action, unless a right to pollute the stream has been acquired by the person causing the pollution, by long enjoyment or grant. A right to pollute a stream can only be acquired by a continuance of a perceptible amount of pollution for the full period of twenty years. A riparian proprietor can therefore maintain a suit to restrain the fouling of the water without showing that the fouling is actually injurious to him, and the fact that the stream is also fouled by others is no defence. The rights of a riparian proprietor are, moreover, not restricted to the present modes of enjoyment of the water, and a new mode of enjoyment gives a right at once to sue for an injury done in respect of such new uses."

The law is stated in much the same way in John Young & Co. v. Bankier Distillery Co. (1), where the headnote reads as follows:

"Every riparian proprietor is entitled to have the natural water of the stream transmitted to him, without sensible alteration in its character or quality. Any invasion of this right causing actual damage or calculated to found a claim which may ripen into an adverse right entitles the party injured to the intervention of the court."

LORD MACNAGHTEN said ([1893] A.C. 698):

"The law relating to the rights of riparian proprietors is well settled. A riparian proprietor is entitled to have the water of the stream, on the banks of which his property lies, flow down as it has been accustomed to flow down to his property, subject to the ordinary use of the flowing water by upper proprietors, and to such further use, if any, on their part in connection with their property as may be reasonable under the circumstances. Every riparian proprietor is thus entitled to the water of his stream, in its natural flow, without sensible diminution or increase and without sensible alteration in its character or quality. Any invasion of this right causing actual damage or calculated to found a claim which may ripen into an adverse right entitles the party injured to the intervention of the court."

A It was not disputed that the temperature of water is part of the "quality" of which LORD MACNAGHTEN speaks. Moreover, the riparian owner is not restricted in his rights by the present mode of enjoyment of the water and may hereafter put it to a new use which will give him the right to sue in respect of injury done to it: see the observations of FRY, J. (5 Ch.D. 773) in Pennington v. Brinsop Hall Coal Co. (2). Each of the plaintiffs is a riparian owner and has, as such, these rights. The plaintiff association is, moreover, the owner or occupier of a several fishery and, as such, has a right to sue for its disturbance which is a legal right.

B In Nicholls v. Ely Beet Sugar Factory, Ltd. (3), LORD WRIGHT, M.R., said ([1936] Ch. 347):

C " . . . there cannot be in the strict sense of the term a trespass to the incorporeal hereditament, but there may be an action in the nature of trespass. That class of case is dealt with in Fitzgerald v. Firbank (4), where it was held 'that the grant did not give a mere licence to fish, but a right to fish and to carry away the fish caught; that this was a profit a prendre, and was an incorporeal hereditament; and that the plaintiffs had a right of action against anyone who wrongfully did any act by which the enjoyment of the rights given to them by the deed was prejudicially affected.'

D LINDLEY, L.J., says ([1897] 2 Ch. 101): 'It was laid down in Smith v. Kemp (5) and is repeated in COMYN'S DIGEST, 5th ed., vol. v., p. 362, "Piscary": "If a grant be de liberâ piscariâ, the grantee shall have the property of the fish there, and shall maintain trespass for fishing there." '—that was the same as the case last cited. 'You cannot draw any distinction'—the lord justice proceeds—'with reference to the right of taking away

E the fish between one kind of right of fishing and another. If a person chooses to pay for the amusement of catching fish and leaving them in the water, of course he can do so.' Then the lord justice goes on to find what the plaintiffs' rights are in the fishery and he adds: 'The defendant has no right to foul the river to the damage of anybody who has rights in that river. He is a mere wrongdoer, though if the plaintiffs had no rights in the river of course they would have no right legally to complain. This is a somewhat unusual case, and I am not aware of any precedent for what I may describe as an action of nuisance by the owner of a sole and exclusive right of fishery. But once grant that the owner of such a right can sue in trespass for one kind of infringement of it, I cannot see why he might not maintain an action on the case for nuisance at common law for such an interference

G with his right as is proved in this case.' That therefore defines the right, and it also defines the cause of action which follows from an infringement of that right. It is not, I think, material to decide whether the proper description of that cause of action is trespass, or trespass on the case or nuisance, forms of action which are now abolished. If it were described as 'nuisance' the word 'nuisance' would be used in that connection as meaning a private nuisance, one which involved an interference with a private right, so that, as I shall explain in a moment, an action would lie for that interference."

H

If, therefore, a single defendant had caused the state of things which I have found, there would be no common law answer to the plaintiffs' claim, but the difficulty in this case has arisen from the fact that there were four and still are three defendants. One of them admits that he has committed an actionable wrong, but the other two allege that, having regard to that state of things, their contribution, if it exists, is harmless and, therefore, not actionable. This point is, in my judgment, answered by Blair & Sumner v. Deakin, Eden & Thwaites v. Deakin (6), a pollution case, where KAY, J., said (57 L.T. 525):

" . . . now, is it the law that, supposing it is impossible to say that any one of those persons [i.e., manufacturers higher up the stream] pours into this stream foul matter enough by itself to create a nuisance, but that what they all pour in together does create a nuisance, that the plaintiffs cannot sue any one of them? If that were so I suppose a plaintiff who lost that which is his natural right—namely, to have the water of the stream pass in its original pure condition—might lose that right entirely by the combined action of a number of manufacturers above him. They might all laugh at him and say, 'You cannot sue any one of us because you cannot prove that what each one of us does would of itself be enough to cause you damage.' All I can observe is that, in my opinion, it would be a most unjust law if there were such a law. Were the case absolutely new, and my individual opinion had to be given upon it, I still should say distinctly that that was not the law. A man is not bound to sue anybody until he finds that he is being injured. A riparian owner has, as I have already remarked, a natural right to the use of the water which passes him in the stream in its original pure condition as nature would send it to him. If he finds that it is no longer in such a condition; that it is impossible to use it for domestic purposes or for manufacturing purposes, and that it becomes a filthy sewer like this stream; and further, if he finds that that was produced by the combined acts of a number of riparian proprietors above him, is he without remedy? Has he no remedy because each one of them can say: 'It was not my doing. I only contributed a part, and the part I did contribute was not enough to do you damage'?"

After referring to other cases and, in particular, to Thorpe v. Brumfitt (7), KAY, J., came to the conclusion that, even though there were no actionable right against any one, there might be, nevertheless, an action against them all.

Deakin's case (6) really did no more than follow Thorpe v. Brumfitt (7). That was a right of way case, where JAMES, L.J., said (8 Ch. App. 656):

"The plaintiff cannot complain, unless he can prove an obstruction which injures him. The case is not like one of trespass, which gives a right of action though no damage be proved. In the present case, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that arrived at by the Master of the Rolls, that the right of access to the inn-yard has been interfered with in a way most prejudicial to the plaintiff. Nothing can be much more injurious to the owner of an inn than that the way to his yard should be constantly obstructed by the loading and unloading of heavy waggons. If a person who was going to put up his horses at the inn was stopped by the loading or unloading of waggons, he would probably at once go to another inn. Then it was said that the plaintiff alleges an obstruction caused by several persons acting independently of each other, and does not show what share each had in causing it. It is probably impossible for a person in the plaintiff's position to show this. Nor do I think it necessary that he should show it. The amount of obstruction caused by any one of them might not, if it stood alone, be sufficient to give any ground of complaint, though the amount caused by them all may be a serious injury. Suppose one person leaves a wheelbarrow standing on a way, that may cause no appreciable inconvenience, but if a hundred do so, that may cause a serious inconvenience, which a person entitled to the use of the way has a right to prevent; and it is no defence to any one person among the hundred to say that what he does causes of itself no damage to the complainant."

Counsel for the corporation sought to distinguish these cases, saying that they merely decided that, where a number of defendants, none of whom individually commits an actionable wrong, produce a wrong by the aggregate of their actions, they may all be sued, and that this does not apply to a case where one defendant admittedly could be sued alone. I do not accept this submission. I cannot believe that the law, while holding all of a number of defendants liable if none of them individually commits an actionable wrong, will relieve all the rest if the wrong of one of them is big enough to be by itself actionable. Indeed, I think that Thorpe v. Brumfitt (7) is an answer to this proposition.

This, however, is not an end of the case, for both the corporation and the power company are statutory bodies having statutory rights and powers on which each of them relies as a defence. I must deal with them individually, and first with the corporation. The existing sewage system was installed in pursuance of the Derby Corporation Act, 1901 (c. cclxvii). This Act recites (inter alia) that it is expedient that the corporation be empowered to construct the sewerage and sewage disposal works thereafter described, and that there should be one scheme for the treatment and disposal of the sewage of the area and that obligations and powers in that behalf should be conferred and imposed. Part V of the Act, headed: "Sewerage and sewage disposal works", begins at s. 105, which authorises the corporation to appropriate and utilise for the treatment and disposal of sewage the lands described in sched. V to the Act which are the site of the corporation's property as shown on the sketch plan which was used by both sides at the trial. Section 106 provides that, subject to the provisions of the Act, the corporation may make, in accordance with the deposited plans, the sewerage works described in the section with all ancillary works. Section 109 (1) is in the following terms:

"The sewage disposal works constructed on the lands acquired under the powers of this Act shall at all times hereafter be conducted so that the same shall not be a nuisance and in particular the corporation shall not allow any noxious or offensive effluvia to escape therefrom or do or permit or suffer any other act which shall be a nuisance or injurious to the health or reasonable comfort of the inhabitants of Spondon and this Act shall not exempt or be deemed to exempt the corporation from any liability for any nuisance arising from such sewage disposal works or from any proceedings which might but for this Act be taken against them under the provisions of the Public Health Acts or otherwise and the county council may take any proceedings they may think fit for the purpose of enforcing or giving effect to these provisions."

The marginal note to this section is: "For protection of parish of Spondon", but this sidenote, as I understand it, cannot control the meaning of the section, at any rate in the absence of some ambiguity. Section 113 is as follows:

"The corporation may divert all brooks streams and waters which can or may be intercepted or taken by the sewers authorised by this Part of this Act and the corporation may by means of such sewers discharge or permit to flow into the River Derwent the waters so intercepted or taken together with any effluent and other waters passing over or through or discharged from the sewage disposal works of the corporation: Provided that nothing in this Part of this Act contained shall authorise the corporation to construct any works or do any other thing in contravention of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, or s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875: Provided also that the corporation shall pay compensation to any person for any damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers of this section the amount of such compensation failing agreement to be settled by arbitration under the Arbitration Act, 1889."

Section 115 (15) deals with the obligations of local authorities having branch sewers which they are to connect with the main sewers of the corporation constructed under the Act, and the sub-section has the following proviso:

"Provided that the corporation shall keep the local authorities respectively indemnified against any breach of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Acts, 1876 and 1893, or the general law which may be committed by the corporation in reference to the treatment and disposal by the corporation of the sewage of the local authorities respectively and not arising through any neglect or default on the part of the local authorities respectively."

Section 117 is in these terms:

"It shall be the duty of the corporation within six months after the passing of this Act to proceed to carry out and execute the sewerage and the sewage disposal works authorised by this Part of this Act and in the event of the corporation not proceeding with such works within such period as aforesaid or not proceeding with the same with due diligence the requirements of this section may be enforced in manner provided by s. 299 of the Public Health Act, 1875."

The extension of the corporation's sewage works in 1930/35 was, according to their counsel, though here the borough engineer differed from him, constructed in pursuance of powers given by the Derby Corporation Act, 1930 (c. lxvi). Section 8 of this Act, which is in Part III, headed "River improvements and street works", after authorising the construction in accordance with the Act of a number of works for protecting the town against floods, includes work No. 13, which is in the following terms:

"A sewer or sewers commencing in an existing overflow chamber of the corporation at a point nine yards or thereabouts measured in an easterly direction from the commencement of Work No. 12 above described and terminating at the westerly bank of the river."

The same section authorises as work No. 9 the diversion of the stream resulting in the C outfall. On this the corporation's counsel argued as follows: (a) having regard to s. 117 of the Act of 1901, it is mandatory on the corporation, and not merely permissive, to carry out the various works authorised by Part V, i.e., the various works enumerated in s. 106 and by that section to be made and maintained in accordance with the deposited plans and none others; (b) if the works were made in accordance with the plans and a nuisance arose from them, the corporation are absolved because they were bound by statute to do the things which created the nuisance; (c) section 109 (1), which forbids the creation of a nuisance, applies only to a nuisance affecting the inhabitants of the parish of Spondon, which the plaintiffs are not; (d) section 113 expressly allows the corporation to discharge into the river any effluent discharged from the sewage disposal works of the corporation, and the only remedy of a person injured is to obtain compensation under the proviso to that section.

It appears to be true, on a comparison of the wording of s. 106 of the Act of 1901 with the deposited plans, that work No. 1 was to be a sewer terminating in the river Derwent. As constructed, this sewer entered an inspection chamber from which the pipe crossed the river at the weir below point A on the sketch plan. From the chamber a short pipe twenty-two yards long went to the river and formed the A outfall. This work was re-constructed after or under the Act of 1930, a second sewer entering the inspection chamber and being carried across the weir. Work No. 13, authorised by s. 8 of the Act of 1930, is described as "A sewer . . . commencing in an existing overflow chamber of the corporation . . . and terminating at the westerly bank of the river."

It is this short sewer which, at times of flood, casts untreated sewage into the river, and it is said that this must have been the intention when the sewer was authorised by Parliament, because a system which provides for overflows of this sort in times of storm necessarily involves this result. I do not accept this argument. I do not see why some form of filter or settlement tank cannot be provided. Indeed, the borough engineer said it could, but that he preferred to have it on the other side of the river. In any event, in so far as it is a nuisance, I am of opinion that s. 109 (1) of the Act of 1901 forbids it, and that the application of the sub-section is not limited to the inhabitants of Spondon, as alleged. Moreover, s. 113 provides expressly that nothing is to authorise the corporation to construct any works in contravention of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, or of s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 3 of the Act of 1876 makes it an offence to cause

“ . . . to fall or flow . . . into any stream any solid or liquid sewage matter . . . ”

Now, admittedly, outfall A does that very thing, and it is, therefore, not authorised by the Act of 1901. Section 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is in a negative form, and has always been interpreted as a proviso, but it clearly does not absolve a local authority who send sewage into a natural stream unless the effluent does not deteriorate the purity or quality of the water. This the corporation's main effluent, in my judgment, does, and, therefore, the Act does not excuse them. The fact that, by the proviso to s. 115 (15) of the Act of 1901, the corporation must indemnify minor local authorities whose works they take over against breaches of the general law seems to show that the acts of the corporation may be a breach of that law, and that they are not in all events protected. As regards the untreated sewage occasionally carried at outfall C into the river by the stream diverted under the Act of 1930, there is nothing in this Act which authorises any sewage at all to be put into that stream. The borough engineer told me that one storm overflow did in fact go into the stream before its diversion, and that others have been put in since. In my judgment, none of these is justified, either under the Act of 1901 or under the Act of 1930.

As to the point taken under the proviso to s. 113 of the Act of 1901 that compensation by arbitration is the only remedy, it is to be observed that this proviso does not cover the whole of Part V, like the proviso that immediately precedes it, but is limited to “ the exercise of the powers of this section ”. In my judgment, the only power conferred by the section is a power to divert streams and deal with waters so intercepted: the reference to effluent discharged from the sewage works does not seem to confer a new power respecting it: the power to turn the effluent into the Derwent is inherent in the direction to construct the works specified in s. 106.

A further point which was taken on the corporation's behalf was that this action is misconceived, the only remedy of the plaintiffs being to proceed by using the machinery of the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 299, and obtaining an order from the appropriate Ministry on the corporation to provide a proper system of sewage: see Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban Council (8). This point rests first on Glossop v. Heston & Isleworth Local Board (9), where the headnote reads:

“ A local board, under the Public Health Act, 1875, causing a nuisance by any act which, independently of the statute, would have given a cause of action to any person, may be made liable in damages, or be restrained by injunction, unless they can show a justification under the powers of the statute. But if a local board do no act themselves to cause a nuisance, but neglect to perform their duty of providing a satisfactory and healthy system of drainage, it is no ground of action by an individual for damages or an injunction, but the remedy is by prerogative writ of mandamus; and semble, this jurisdiction, notwithstanding s. 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873, ought not to be exercised except by the Queen's Bench Division.”

The defendants were a local board constituted in November, 1875, under the Public Health Act, 1875. The plaintiff complained that for some time before and since the defendants became the sanitary authority, sewage was allowed to fall into a stream passing near his residence so as to pollute it and cause a nuisance to him. He complained to the defendants in May, 1876, and, nothing having been done, he brought an action against them in July, 1876, for damages and an injunction.

In his judgment, JAMES, L.J., said (12 Ch.D. 109):

"I am of opinion that, whatever may have led to it, this action was commenced by the plaintiff through a misapprehension as to what the legal rights and liabilities were—his legal rights against the board, and the liabilities of that board towards him. It is quite manifest, from the form of the claim and the evidence, that the action was not based upon any act whatever done by the defendants. It is based entirely upon their alleged neglect to perform the parliamentary duty cast upon them as the sanitary authority of a particular district. It is said that this is a very serious matter to the plaintiff and to the public generally. It appears to me that if this action could be sustained, it would be a very serious matter indeed for every ratepayer in England in any district in which there is any local authority upon which duties are cast for the benefit of the locality. If this action could be maintained, I do not see why it could not in a similar manner be maintained by every owner of land in that district who could allege that if there had been a proper system of sewage his property would be very much improved."

The Isleworth case (9), therefore, depended on the fact that the local board had done nothing themselves to cause the nuisance, but had merely inherited from predecessors sewers which brought it about. This, therefore, was an illustration of the well-known doctrine that a local authority will not be liable for mere non-feasance as opposed to misfeasance.

The next case relied on was A.-G. v. Dorking Guardians (10), where the head-note is:

"A sanitary authority in whom the sewers are vested have only a limited ownership in them; they are not in the same position as to responsibility for fouling a stream as a private individual, because they cannot stop the sewers on account of the damage to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. And although, perhaps, the sanitary authority might obtain an injunction to restrain persons from using the sewers who had no right to do so, a landowner complaining of the nuisance cannot bring an action against them for not doing so; because an action cannot be maintained either at law or in equity to compel a person to bring an action for the purpose of restraining a nuisance which he cannot himself prevent. Where a sanitary authority have not themselves constructed sewers which are a nuisance, but only permitted them to be used as formerly by the inhabitants, they are not doing an act which can be restrained under the Public Health Acts or the Rivers Pollution Act, 1876. But if they are neglecting their duty in providing a sufficient sanitary scheme for the neighbourhood the remedy of an aggrieved landowner is by mandamus."

This, therefore, was again a case where the sewers had not been constructed by the local authority themselves. It was said, however, that the matter was carried further by Robinson v. Workington Corpn. (11). Here, however, the claim was admittedly founded on non-feasance, namely, the fact that the defendants had not constructed a sewer, in the place of the existing one, of sufficient dimensions to carry off the sewage in the district in which the plaintiff resided. It was decided that, as the obligation of the defendants to do anything in the matter arose out of the statute, namely, the Public Health Act, 1875, default on their part could only be dealt with by the statutory remedy under the Act. Lastly, Hesketh v. Birmingham Corpn. (12) was cited. In that case the defendant corporation had made the outlets into a stream which eventually caused the flooding of which the plaintiff complained. His complaint was that they had not enlarged the capacity of the stream. It was not a case about foul sewage, and no breach of s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was alleged. The court held that the neglect to enlarge the stream was a mere non-feasance and not actionable.

None of these cases, as it seems to me, covers a case where the defendants have themselves created the sewers which caused the nuisance, for this must be a misfeasance. The plaintiffs' claim here is not that the corporation have neglected to provide further sewers, although it may be that the remedy for that of which they complain will be the construction of further sewers. They are not ratepayers of Derby who complain of the insufficiency of the drainage of the city. Their complaint is the converse, namely, that the city is so drained that their property outside it is damaged. More in point, as it seems to me, is the decision of PARKER, J., in Jones v. Llanrust Urban Council (13), where the headnote is:

"A riparian owner on the banks of a natural stream, whether he is or is not the owner of any part of the bed of the stream, is entitled to the flow of the water, past his land, in its natural state of purity, undeteriorated by noxious matter discharged into it by others. Any one so fouling the water infringes a right of property of the riparian owner, who can maintain an action against the infringer without proving actual damage, and obtain an injunction to prevent the continuance of the injury. Any one who turns faecal matter, or allows faecal matter collected by him or under his control to escape, into a river in such a manner or under such conditions that it is carried, whether by current or wind, on to his neighbour's land is, on the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (14) (1868) (L.R. 3 H.L. 330), guilty of a trespass. Where the faecal matter so causing injury is discharged from a sewer, on the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (14) the duty at common law of the owner of the sewer, whether he made it or not, is to prevent the sewage therein from escaping to the injury of others, and mere neglect of this duty gives a good cause of action to any person injured by such neglect. A private individual is entitled to an injunction to restrain a local authority from allowing sewage to escape from its sewer to his injury, notwithstanding the statutory right of the inhabitants of the authority's district to send their sewage into its sewers."

It is true that, in that case, PARKER, J., was at pains to distinguish the Isleworth case (9) and the Dorking case (10) on the ground that the defendants before him inherited their system, not under the Public Health Act, 1875, but under the Local Government Act, 1894. He decided the case, I think, on the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (14), and this was recently referred to by VAISEY, J., in Haigh v. Deudraeth Rural District Council (15). The principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (14) is relevant here, for it seems to me that, if the corporation collect on their lands poisonous and harmful substances such as these, they must, in the absence of express statutory protection, be liable for their escape on to the land of another.

In my judgment, the line of cases headed by the Isleworth case (9) does not help the corporation, because this is a case, not of non-feasance, but of misfeasance, seeing that the Derby Corporation Acts, 1901 and 1930, which authorise the construction and maintenance of the offending works, do so only on the footing that no nuisance be created and that the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, and s. 17 of the Public Health Act, 1875, be observed. If the corporation send effluent into the river in defiance of those Acts, being a nuisance, they are committing a wrong, and not merely permitting one. Earl of Harrington v. Derby Corpn. (16), a former case between these same parties, is also relevant here. It is to be observed that BUCKLEY, J., cited ([1905] 1 Ch. 223), the Isleworth case (9) and the Dorking case (10), and agreed that they applied to old sewers into which householders of Derby had discharged their sewage and to the sewers which Derby Corporation had inherited from their predecessors. But the learned judge had no doubt that the corporation could be made liable to Lord Harrington in respect of sewers laid by the corporation themselves and in respect of additional sewage arising from the conversion to water closets of privies under their direction, and he gave damages, accordingly, under these heads. This seems quite inconsistent with the corporation's present submissions.

The power company also relies on statutory defences. The British Electricity Authority is the creation of the Electricity Act, 1947, by s. 1 (1) of which it was established, with a duty as from the vesting date, namely, April 11, 1948, of developing and maintaining an efficient, co-ordinated and economical system of electricity supply for all parts of Great Britain, and for that purpose, among other things, to generate supplies of electricity. The Central Authority, as they are called in the Act, took over the undertakings of a large number of authorised suppliers of electricity, including the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Company, which was their predecessor on the site in question, and, by proviso (i) to s. 14 (2) of the Act, all property, rights, liabilities and obligations appertaining to generating stations which immediately before the vesting date were vested in authorised undertakers, such as the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Power Company, vested on that date in the Central Authority. By s. 57 (2) of the Act of 1947, the schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, was incorporated in the Act subject to modifications mentioned in Part III of sched. IV to the Act of 1947, by virtue of which s. 81 of the schedule to the Act of 1899 was not to apply to the Central Authority [see s. 2 of the schedule to the Act of 1899, as substituted by sched. IV to the Act of 1947]. Section 81 of the schedule to the Act of 1899 [as amended by the Act of 1947] is:

"Nothing in this schedule or any local enactment shall exonerate the undertakers from any indictment, action, or other proceedings for nuisance in the event of any nuisance being caused or permitted by them."

The effect of its exclusion is to entitle the Central Authority to plead the defence of statutory authority even though a nuisance is being created, but this does not absolve them in all circumstances from causing a nuisance.

As the Central Authority inherits the liabilities of the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Company, it is necessary to look at the statutory powers of that concern. The first Act is the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1901 (c. cxxi), which incorporated the company and empowered it to construct, maintain and work electric generating stations, and supply electrical energy or power, with ancillary powers, and to acquire certain lands. The area of supply did not include the city of Derby at this time. By the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1902 (c. xvii), the company's power to construct generating stations was enlarged. The Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire Electric Power Act, 1929 (c. lxxxvi), s. 36, expressly authorised the maintenance and carrying on of the generating station and works the subject of the present complaint. Section 37 of the Act, which is the chief prop of the power company in the action, says:

"(1) The company may abstract water from the River Derwent and may utilise the same for condensing and other purposes of the generating station situate upon the lands described in sched. I to this Act: Provided that all water so abstracted except that unavoidably lost by evaporation shall be returned to the river above Borrowash Weir in such a condition as not to cause injury to fish. (2) Nothing in this section or in the section of this Act of which the marginal note is 'Maintenance and use of generating station' [s. 36] shall authorise the company to abstract water from or return water to the River Derwent in any manner contrary to or inconsistent with the provisions of the deed set forth in sched. II to this Act or in any manner prejudice diminish alter or take away any of the rights privileges powers or authorities vested in or enjoyed by Charles Joseph Leicester Earl of Harrington or his heirs or successors in estate or any person in trust for him or them as owner or owners of Borrowash Mill and the weirs and sluices referred to in the said deed or as riparian owner or owners upon the river except so far as may be provided by the said deed."

A Section 39 of this Act gives the company power to acquire by agreement further lands up to two hundred acres

" . . . for the purposes of their works and undertaking but the company shall not create or permit a nuisance on any such lands."

B It is under this last section that the company acquired the land on the right bank of the river on which the cooling towers are now situate.

The statutory defences of the power company, therefore, are (i) that having regard to the exclusion of s. 81 of the schedule to the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899 [by s. 3 of the Derbyshire Electric Power Act of 1901], it is not liable at the suit of a member of the public even though it creates a nuisance; (ii) that, by virtue of s. 37 (1) of the Act of 1929, it is specifically empowered to abstract water from the river and use it in the way in which it does. Junior counsel for the power company boldly asserted that common law liability need not be considered at all, but that the only available action was one for breach of a statutory duty, and that the present claim is, therefore, misconceived.

C As for the first defence, counsel relied on the well-known passage in VISCOUNT DUNEDIN's speech ([1930] A.C. 183) in Manchester Corp'n. v. Farnworth (17):

D "That brings me to say a word or two on what I conceive to be the well settled law on such matters. The cases are numerous . . ."

After mentioning a number of them, he continued (ibid.):

E "I mention these to show that I have carefully considered the question but I think it would be of no real service to analyse exactly what was decided in each actual case. I believe their whole effect may be expressed in a very few sentences. When Parliament has authorised a certain thing to be made or done in a certain place, there can be no action for nuisance caused by the making or doing of that thing if the nuisance is the inevitable result of the making or doing so authorised. The onus of proving that the result is inevitable is on those who wish to escape liability for nuisance, but the criterion of inevitability is not what is theoretically possible but what is possible according to the state of scientific knowledge at the time, having also in view a certain common sense appreciation, which cannot be rigidly defined, of practical feasibility in view of situation and of expense."

F Is, then, the nuisance the inevitable result of that which Parliament has authorised? It is said that it is, having regard to the fact that each increase in the generating capacity of the station was authorised by the Electricity Commissioners. This, however, is very far from showing that the result, viz., the excessive heating of the water, is inevitable. Mr. Woods, a witness for the power company, admitted that the station could be run, as many stations are, on what he called a closed circuit, without pouring any heated water into the river, and it is clear enough that, short of this, other expedients such as the cooling towers already in existence could be found, by means of which the water could be reduced to a tolerable temperature before it was returned to the river.

H The second defence is more relied on. In my judgment, the right of the power company to abstract the water of the river for its purposes is not an absolute right which exists whether or no the water is returned as the proviso directs. Counsel for the power company argued that the only action for which the power company was liable was for a breach of its statutory duty in returning water to the river in a condition injurious to fish, contrary to the proviso to s. 37 (1) of the Act of 1929. I am of opinion that, on its true construction, s. 37 (1) authorises the power company to abstract the river water only so long as it complies with the proviso. If the proviso be not complied with, then the right goes with it. If this be so, the question is whether the condition of the water as it returns to the river after use by the power company is such as to be injurious to fish, i.e., to fish life in the abstract, and not merely to fish in the plaintiffs' waters. To this there can be only one answer. Water heated to a temperature of over a hundred degrees Fahrenheit must be highly injurious to any fish native to English waters. It was further argued on the plaintiffs' behalf that the quantity of chlorine found in the effluent itself was injurious to fish, and that the proviso does not mean that the river, after the effluent has mingled with it, shall not be injurious, but that the effluent itself shall not be injurious. In my judgment, the right answer is the latter, and, if so, there is evidence that on some occasions a quantity of free chlorine is emitted, which may cause injury to fish, but I regard this as a subsidiary matter.

Section 37 of the Act of 1929, however, does not stop there, for s. 37 (2) specifically provides that the power to maintain the station given by s. 36 is not to authorise the power company to "prejudice diminish alter or take away" the rights of the Earl of Harrington or his sequels in title "as riparian owner or owners upon the river". Section 37 (2) is mainly concerned with the reach of the river immediately below the power station and above Borrowash Bridge, and at first sight it seemed to me that the apparently general words at the end of the sub-section ought to be limited to the Earl's rights as riparian owner in the reach with which the section deals. If so, this sub-section has no application, for the riparian rights which the Earl, the second plaintiff, is here seeking to protect are below Borrowash Bridge. On consideration, however, I conclude that I am not justified in limiting the words as suggested, and that they protect the riparian rights of the Earl anywhere he has them on the river. If this be right, the statutory power given by s. 36 to maintain the station cannot avail the power company, and it is relegated to its common law position. In the upshot, therefore, I hold that the plaintiffs have established a good cause of action against both the corporation and the power company, as they admittedly have against the first defendant.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

April 7. HARMAN, J.: It now falls to me to determine the form of order which should be the outcome of the judgment I delivered on Mar. 31. First, the question arises whether there should be any injunction in the circumstances or whether the plaintiffs should content themselves with some less relief? Prima facie, a plaintiff, whose rights have been invaded in the way in which I have held these rights to be invaded, is entitled to relief from this court by way of injunction. It is not denied by the first defendant, or by the third defendant, that some form of injunction is appropriate, but Derby Corporation, the second defendants, say that as against them no injunction should go. The corporation put in the forefront of their claim their position as local authority statutory undertakers, and say that they can only obtain a loan on the authority of the Ministry of Health and that that will involve an inquiry under the Local Government Act, 1933, and whether or not they will be able to do anything depends, therefore, on matters outside their control, and they say they ought not to be affected by an injunction, because the court should not grant an injunction in a case where it may or may not be possible to carry it out. It seems to me that that plea, if it were good, would make it impossible ever to grant an injunction against a local authority in this position. It is well known that many such injunctions have been granted. It is well known too, I think, that a local authority with the pressure of such an injunction on it is in a strong position to say that it is a deserving candidate for the necessary financial help which it may be only the Ministry of Health can now give. I see no reason on that ground for the suggestion that one should leave the corporation to invoke the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 322. That is a matter I have already decided adversely to the corporation, because they submitted to me that the only remedy of the plaintiffs was a remedy through the statutory measures, and that submission I rejected. It was then suggested that the injury to the plaintiffs might be compensated properly in damages, and that, once the effluent of British Celanese, Ltd., the first defendant, was removed, an injunction would be quite unnecessary. I am quite unconvinced that that is so as a matter of fact. I do not think this is the kind of damage which can ever be compensated by an award of damages, but the contribution of the corporation is a substantial one, and I think an injunction must follow. Consequently I propose to grant an injunction against all the defendants.

I think the most convenient form is to grant an injunction against each of the three defendants restraining them from causing or permitting (whether by their agents or otherwise) any effluent to flow or pass from their respective premises in the county of Derby into the river Derwent, so as to alter (either by itself or in combination with any effluent discharged into the river by any of the other defendants or any other person) to the injury of the plaintiffs the quality of the waters of the river Derwent or of the river Trent where they flow past or over the plaintiffs' premises, and to add to that an injunction not to cause or permit the effluent to flow into the river so as to interfere with the enjoyment by the plaintiffs or either of them or their sequels in title or those claiming through or under them the right of fishing in the plaintiffs' waters as mentioned and defined in the statement of claim. I think those two injunctions will cover all that the plaintiffs ought to have.

I think it is right that pressure ought to be brought to bear on wrongdoers in the position of the defendants, and, therefore, I shall suspend the injunction for two years only, and at the end of that time, if a further suspension be wanted, there will have to be proceedings either before me or some other judge in this Division. Of course, that involves that during those two years some of the damage of which the plaintiffs complain will be continuing, because the effluent to a greater or less degree will continue to come down the stream. Therefore, the defendants will be put under an undertaking, which will be a term of the suspension of the injunction, to indemnify the plaintiffs in the terms used by FRY, J., in Pennington v. Brinsop Hall Coal Co. (2). They must undertake to indemnify the plaintiffs to such an extent and in such manner as the court may direct, against all damage arising out of the suspension of the injunction, and the damage for which the defendants may be held liable on the inquiry which will afterwards be directed, and the defendants will also be put on terms to report in writing to the plaintiffs by Mar. 31, 1953, as to their activities in the pursuit of their compliance with the injunctions granted. Those reports must not be made a cause of oppression by the plaintiffs, but will enable them to know and satisfy themselves that something at least is being done to help.

This action was not only an action for an injunction, but was also an action for damages in trespass and nuisance, and it is convenient, I think, to put the damages under both trespass and nuisance as one inquiry. I propose to say that the inquiry shall be taken by the judge in person. There arises a point which is, so far as I know, novel, and that is that each of the defendants applies to me here and now to apportion the damage between them. There is a power under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, to make an order of this sort. In s. 6 (2) there are these words:

"In any proceedings for contribution under this section the amount of the contribution recoverable from any person shall be such as may be found by the court to be just and equitable having regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage . . ."

As between tortfeasors who are liable having regard to s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act it is provided that,

“any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tortfeasor or otherwise . . .”

The defendants say that they are not joint tortfeasors, but they are severally liable to the plaintiffs for a tort, the fouling of the plaintiffs' premises and the obstruction of their fishing. That is one tort to which all the defendants have contributed something. However, it is not a case of defendants acting in concert or being joint tortfeasors, and their respective contributions are, to some extent, of a very different kind, but they all add up to the one thing in the end. On the one hand, it is said that the plaintiffs ought to have the advantage of a judgment for the whole sum against all. On the other hand, it is said by the defendants that each of them should have the advantage of knowing what is the extent of his liabilities. I have been referred to Croston v. Vaughan (18), where PORTER, J., held himself entitled in a motor car case to apportion the damage to two defendants, each of whom he had held to be in part responsible for the damage which accrued to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was a passenger in a car and sued the driver of that car and two other drivers of motor cars, because she was injured in an accident in which they were involved. PORTER, J., found that the driver of the car in which the passenger was riding was partly to blame, but one of the other drivers was more to blame, and having, in the first instance, given judgment for a lump sum against both those defendants, he was asked to make an apportionment under s. 6 of the Act of 1935. That he did and awarded the damages as to two-thirds and one-third. That, I think, must have involved the withdrawal of the judgment against the defendants jointly and have become a judgment against each of them severally for those several sums. The Court of Appeal held that that was a course which was within the judge's jurisdiction. If this was a case in which I could award damages now, I could be asked clearly to apportion those damages, but it is said that because there is an inquiry to come, and because it may be convenient for the plaintiffs to have all the defendants responsible on that inquiry, I ought not now to apportion the damages. I think that I have jurisdiction to do so, and that it would be proper that I should. The defendants, having agreed between themselves in what proportion they should pay the damages, I propose to incorporate in the order, not a declaration, because I cannot make declarations by consent, but an order that the damages, when certified as the result of the inquiry, “are paid by the several defendants in the proportions following”, and then they will be set out. The advantage to the defendants, of course, is that on the inquiry each defendant will then consider what, if anything, he has to pay into court according to his estimate of the sum total of the whole damage, and will not have to pay into court the total amount.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Marchant, Gerrish & Newington (for the plaintiffs); Linklaters & Paines (for the first defendant); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co., agents for E. H. Nichols, town clerk, Derby (for the second defendants); R. A. Finn (for the third defendants).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NOTE.

SLATER v. SLATER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), April 29, 30, May 1, 1952.]

A Divorce—Pleading—Answer—Sufficiency of bare denial—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), r. 17 (1).

PETITION by husband for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's desertion.

B The wife's answer in its original form merely denied the alleged desertion. At the conclusion of the evidence leave was granted to amend the answer so as to set up the real defence to the petition as apparent from the evidence, namely, that there had been a mutual agreement to separate, that this agreement had been repudiated by the husband, that this repudiation was accepted by the wife who then expressed a wish to resume cohabitation, and that in those circumstances the husband was the deserting party.

H. H. V. Forbes for the husband.

C L. Brooks for the wife.

D WILLMER, J., in the course of his judgment, said: I think this is a case in which it is appropriate to refer to the form of the answer that was originally put in to this petition. Rule 17 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, requires that every answer containing more than a simple denial of the facts stated in the petition should set out with sufficient particularity the facts relied on, but not the evidence by which they are to be proved. It seems to me that an answer which contains nothing but a bare denial in a case of this character offends against both the letter and the spirit of that rule. A bare denial, if it means anything at all, amounts to a denial that the separation ever took place in the way or at the time the petitioner alleges. In the present case that has never been the wife's contention.

E I am tempted to raise the question whether a bare denial is ever an appropriate or sufficient answer in a desertion case. It may very well be that where the charge is adultery or cruelty a bare denial is an appropriate answer, but in answer to a charge of desertion the respondent may be going to say any one of a number of things. He may be going to say that there was no separation; or that, although there was a separation, it was a separation by consent; or that the petitioner gave him good cause for leaving her; or that the petitioner's conduct was such as to drive him out; or that it was true that he had deserted the petitioner without cause, but that he had put himself right by making bona fide efforts to return. Each and all of those answers would afford a perfect defence to a charge of desertion, and I should have thought that, if the respondent is going to set up one of those cases, both the spirit and the letter of the rule require that it should be pleaded with full particulars. I may, perhaps, add these two observations. From his own client's point of view, the pleader who puts on paper the facts which his client is going to allege gives much greater conviction to the evidence when it is eventually given. On the other side, it seems to me that the petitioner is entitled to be told what the real case of the respondent is, not only as a matter of natural justice, but also for another and special reason of which I think this case furnishes a good example. Had the petitioner here known what the real defence of the respondent was going to be, it may well be that the petitioner would have desired to plead to those allegations by way of reply, but where a bare denial is put in there is no right of reply and the petitioner has been deprived of that opportunity.

H Solicitors: Neil Maclean & Co. (for the husband); J. S. Stevens (for the wife).

A.T.H.

ALLIED IRONFOUNDERS, LTD. v. JOHN SMEDLEY, LTD., AND OTHERS.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), May 5, 1952.]

Landlord and Tenant—New lease—Sub-tenancy—Time for giving notice and making claim—Expiration of head lease by effluxion of time—Sub-lease terminable by notice—Notice given to operate expiration of after head lease—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 5 (1) (2). A

Lessees of business premises granted a sub-lease of part of them for two and a half years and thereafter until determined by either party by giving six calendar months' notice in writing to expire on Dec. 25, 1948, or any subsequent quarter day. The sub-lease contained no reference to the fact that the head lease expired on Mar. 25, 1952. On Mar. 24, 1952, the lessees gave the sub-tenants notice to quit on Sept. 29, 1952. The lessors brought an action for possession of the premises against the lessees and the sub-tenants, and on Apr. 23, 1952, the sub-tenants served notice on the lessees claiming the grant of a new lease in lieu of compensation for goodwill under s. 5 (1) and (11) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. B

HELD : the sub-tenancy was terminated by the expiration of the head lease on Mar. 25, 1952, and not by the operation of the notice of Mar. 24, and, therefore, the sub-tenancy was not "terminated by notice" within s. 4 (1) or s. 5 (2) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, with the result that the notice requiring a new lease under s. 5 (1) and an application for a new lease under s. 5 (2) (if made) were out of time. C

AS TO TENANT'S RIGHT TO A NEW LEASE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 297-299, para. 340; FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927, s. 5 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 892; and FOR CASES, see 2nd DIGEST Supp. D

PRELIMINARY ISSUE in an action for possession.

By a lease dated Apr. 25, 1932, the landlords, plaintiffs in the action, let premises in 28 Brook Street, and 2 Haunch of Venison Yard, London, W.1, to the first defendants, John Smedley, Ltd., for twenty years terminating on Mar. 25, 1952. By a sub-lease dated June 3, 1946, the first defendants let part of the premises to the third defendants, J. & S. Bickley, Ltd., for two and a half years from Dec. 25, 1945, and thereafter until determined by either party by giving six calendar months' notice in writing to expire on Dec. 25, 1948, or on any subsequent quarter day in any year. There was no reference in the recital or in the operative part of the sub-lease to the termination of the head lease on Mar. 25, 1952. The sub-lease continued after the end of its fixed term. The landlords, requiring the premises for their own occupation, did not extend the head lease. The first defendants did not give six months' notice to determine the sub-lease on Mar. 25, 1952, but on Mar. 24, 1952, they gave notice to determine it on Sept. 29, 1952. On Mar. 27 the landlords issued a writ for possession against the first and second defendants (the latter being sub-tenants of another part of the premises with which this report is not concerned), and they both gave possession. On Apr. 23, 1952, the third defendants, who had also been joined as parties, served on the first defendants a notice claiming a new lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5 (1) and (11) in lieu of claiming compensation for goodwill under s. 4 (1). On the hearing of a summons for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, DEVLIN, J., gave leave to defend and made an order that the point raised on the defence should be tried as a preliminary point of law. The landlords contended that the tribunal provided by s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1927 had no jurisdiction to grant a lease to the third defendants. E F G H

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and N. R. King for the landlords.

N. C. Bridge for the third defendants.

DEVLIN, J., stated the facts and continued: Section 5 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, provides:

A “(1) Where the tenant alleges that, though he would be entitled to compensation under the last foregoing section, the sum which could be awarded to him under that section would not compensate him for the loss of goodwill he will suffer if he removes to and carries on his trade or business in other premises, he may in lieu of claiming such compensation, at any time within the period allowed for making a claim under the said section, serve on the landlord notice requiring a new lease of the premises at which the trade or business is carried on to be granted to him. (2) Where B such a notice is so served, the tribunal, on application being made for the purpose either by the landlord or by the tenant not less than nine months before the termination of the tenancy, or, where the tenancy is terminated by notice, within two months after the service of the notice, may, if it considers that the grant of a new tenancy is in all the circumstances reasonable, order the grant of a new tenancy . . . ”

C The first defendants' lease from the landlords and the third defendants' tenancy from the first defendants, have both come to an end, but there is a provision in s. 5 (1), enabling the tribunal to make an order binding on the landlords:

D “Where the term for which, in the opinion of the tribunal, a new lease should be ordered to be granted would extend beyond the termination of the lease held by the immediate landlord, the power of the tribunal under this section to order the grant of a new lease shall include power to order the grant of such lease and reversionary leases that the combined effect thereof will be equivalent to the grant of a new lease for such term as aforesaid.”

E Counsel for the landlords contends that the conditions precedent to the exercise of the tribunal's jurisdiction under s. 5 (1) and (2) have not been and cannot now be fulfilled, that there is no power to waive or modify them, and that any claim brought before the tribunal must as a matter of law necessarily fail. He claims that the notice required by s. 5 (1) has not been given within the statutory time, and it is conceded that neither the tribunal nor anyone else has power to extend that time. The conditions specified in s. 5 (1) and (2) are conditions precedent to the jurisdiction of the tribunal. The F first is that the notice referred to must be served within the statutory time, and the second is that an application must be made by the tenant not less than nine months before the termination of the tenancy, or, where the tenancy is terminated by notice, within two months after the service of the notice. Two months from the date of the notice to quit—Mar. 24, 1952—have not yet expired. Accordingly, if the sub-lease is a tenancy which was terminated by notice, application can still be made. Otherwise the application had to be made not G less than nine months before the termination of the tenancy, and that time has long since gone by. Under s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1927 the notice must be served

“at any time within the period allowed for making a claim under the said section”, and that period is thus prescribed by s. 4 (1):

H “The tenant of a holding to which this Part of this Act applies shall, if a claim for the purpose is made in the prescribed manner—(i) in the case of a tenancy terminated by notice, within one month after the service of the notice on the tenant; and (ii) in any other case, not more than thirty-six nor less than twelve months before the termination of the tenancy . . . ”

The same point arises. If this tenancy was terminated by the notice of Mar. 24, it is conceded that within one month of that time notice under the Act was given, but, if it was not so terminated, it is also conceded that no notice under the Act was given between thirty-six and twelve months before the termination of the tenancy.

The first question that has been argued is whether this notice to quit at any time had any effect or validity in law. If the true view of the sub-lease is that, although it is not expressed to terminate on Mar. 25, 1952, it must be taken so to terminate because the head lease terminated on that date, then the giving of any notice after Sept. 25, 1951, would be merely illusory and of no value or effect. On that basis the construction of the lease would be that it was for two and a half years certain—i.e., its minimum period would be up to June 25, 1948—that its maximum period was until Mar. 25, 1952, and that between those two dates it might be terminated at a quarter day by six months' notice. It has, however, been argued for the third defendants that that is not the effect which ought to be given to the sub-lease. They concede that, if the head lease was determined on Mar. 25, 1952, the sub-lease must fall with it, whether notice had been given or not. But, they say, had the first defendants obtained a new lease going beyond Mar. 25, 1952, or had they obtained the freehold—had they, in short, obtained a title to the land which would have enabled them to continue their sub-lease to the third defendants—since the sub-lease sets no express limit of Mar. 25, 1952, they would have been obliged to continue it until they terminated it in the only way prescribed in the document, which is by giving six months' notice.

This is an arguable contention, but I do not propose to decide the case on that point. I shall assume in favour of the third defendants that the sub-lease did not necessarily come to an end on Mar. 25, 1952, but might have gone on beyond it if the first defendants had acquired a title to the property. On this basis counsel for the third defendants has argued that it was at the time of the giving of the notice of Mar. 24 uncertain how the tenancy would be terminated. It was conceivable that, in the twenty-four hours which elapsed, negotiations might have taken place between the first defendants and the landlords by which the first defendants obtained a title to the property. It might be hardly likely to happen, but counsel is right in saying on his view of the sub-lease that, until the actual expiry of the head lease, no one could know with certainty as a matter of law whether that lease was going to be renewed and the first defendants' title was going to be extended. Therefore, he says, this notice at the time it was given was a valid and effective notice to terminate the tenancy within the period of six months. The fact that something supervened which terminated the tenancy by some other method, does not affect this position. As I understand his argument he says one has to look at the position as at the date the notice was given and if at that date the notice is effective to terminate an existing tenancy, it falls within the provisions of the Act.

That, of course, is a matter of the construction of the words of s. 4 (1):

“in the case of a tenancy terminated by notice, within one month after the service of the notice on the tenant.”

The language evidently refers to some event which either has taken place, or, it may be, is going to take place, and not to any quality in the lease. It does not refer to a tenancy terminable by notice for the obvious reason that many leases are terminable by notice or by effluxion of time according to what happens. A tenancy for twenty-one years may be terminable by notice given at the end of seven or fourteen years, but the Act does not seek to divide leases into categories according to whether they are terminable by notice or not, since there are no such precise categories. The word “terminated” is used deliberately and is not to be construed as if it meant terminable.

The question is, therefore, one, which, I think, is of fact: Was this sub-tenancy terminated by notice? Of course, no tenancy is terminated by notice in the sense that it terminates on the day that the notice is given. The Act clearly means terminated by operation of the notice, although until the notice has expired the tenancy remains alive. In my opinion, to the question whether this sub-tenancy was terminated by operation of the notice given on Mar. 24 there can be only one answer—it was terminated on Mar. 25, long before the notice had expired, because the head lease then expired, and it is immaterial that the third defendants may be able to say that, if events had happened otherwise, it might have been terminated in some other way. In the vast majority of cases when notice is given, although I suppose one cannot be certain at the date of the notice that the tenancy will be terminated by the notice, one is pretty sure that it will. That may be why the statute is not concerned to distinguish between the state of facts on the day the notice was given and the state of facts as ultimately they may be. If a notice to quit is a six months' notice, the notice under the Act has to be given before the notice to quit has operated. In the ordinary case everybody will know that a notice to quit is going to operate. In this very exceptional case, on the facts which I have assumed, the persons concerned did not know for certain, or might not have known for certain, that the notice was going to operate. That, in my judgment, makes no difference to the inquiry which has to be made, which is: When it is known how the tenancy was brought to an end, was it terminated by notice, and, if it was terminated by notice, was the notice under the Act served within one month after the service of the notice to quit. It would be a dangerous thing to try to get away from the natural meaning of words because exceptional circumstances which the Act may or may not have contemplated have introduced an element which might tempt one to think that the policy of the legislature might have been different. That is not a question which any court has to determine. It has only to apply the words of the Act to the facts of the particular case, and, doing so I think leads inevitably to the conclusion at which I have arrived.

The result is, therefore, that I accept the argument of counsel for the landlords that, no notice having been served within the statutory time, the tribunal could not have jurisdiction, and, therefore, there can be no claim made by the third defendants under the Act of 1927.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors: Savory, Pryor & Blagden (for the landlords); Gery & Brooks (for the second sub-tenants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

CURTIN v. CURTIN.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.), May 9, 1952.]

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance order—Enforcement—Wife “residing with” husband—Husband living in wife’s house—Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (c. 51), s. 1 (4).

On Jan. 31, 1951, justices made a maintenance order against a husband. Between that date and May 9, 1951, the parties lived—though not as man and wife—in a house owned by the wife who did not take any step to evict her husband because she was erroneously of the opinion that, if she did so, she might be adjudged guilty of desertion. By May 9 the husband was in arrear with the payments under the order to the extent of £26. On an application to commit him to prison for failure to comply with the order, HELD: if a husband resided with his wife in her house she also resided with him within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, s. 1 (4); as, for a period of three months after the making of the order, the wife had so resided the order was no longer enforceable; and no order for the committal of the husband could be made.

FOR THE SUMMARY JURISDICTION (SEPARATION AND MAINTENANCE) ACT, 1925, s. 1 (4), see HALSBURY’S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 864.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Evans v. Evans, [1947] 2 All E.R. 656; [1948] 1 K.B. 175; [1948] L.J.R. 276; 112 J.P. 23; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Thomas v. Thomas, [1948] 2 All E.R. 98; [1948] 2 K.B. 294; [1948] L.J.R. 1943; 112 J.P. 345; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Wheatley v. Wheatley, [1949] 2 All E.R. 428; [1950] 1 K.B. 39; 113 J.P. 459; 2nd Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Middlesex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Wealdstone on Aug. 15, 1951, an information was preferred by the wife against the husband alleging that he had not complied with an order made on Jan. 31, 1951, on the ground of his wilful neglect to provide her with reasonable maintenance, that he should pay her maintenance at the rate of 40s. a week. Between Jan. 31, 1951, and May 9, 1951, the parties were living in the same house, but not as man and wife. The house was owned by the wife who had not asked the husband to leave or taken any step to evict him because she feared that, if she did so, she might be adjudged guilty of desertion. Otherwise, she would have asked him to leave, and, if he had refused, would have tried to force him to go. By May 9, 1951, the husband was in arrears with the payments under the order to the extent of £26 11s. For the husband it was contended that, as the parties were living under the same roof, under s. 1 (4) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, the order had ceased to have effect. The wife contended that the husband insisted on residing in her house so as to defeat the order, and that he was residing with her and not she with him. The justices being of the opinion that s. 1 (4) was limited in its operation to a wife who continued to reside with the husband and not to a husband who continued to reside with his wife, held that the order was enforceable and committed the husband to prison for three lunar months in default of payment of the arrears.

Stranger-Jones for the husband.

Charles Lawson for the wife.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: If we could see our way to uphold the order of the justices we would do so, because it is very desirable that a man should maintain his wife, more especially when the matrimonial home happens to be the wife's house in which the husband lives and does not pay anything. The difficulty in these cases is the wording of the Act. I am not going to repeat what has been said by the court in Evans v. Evans (1), Thomas v. Thomas (2) and Wheatley v. Wheatley (3). The only difference between this case and Evans v. Evans (1) is that in Evans v. Evans (1) the house belonged to the husband and the wife insisted on living in it, whereas in this case the wife has allowed the husband to reside in her house. The wording of s. 1 (4) of the Act is that the order shall have no effect

" . . . whilst the married woman with respect to whom the order was made resides with her husband, and any such order shall cease to have effect if for a period of three months after it is made the married woman continues to reside with her husband."

B So that, if she was residing with her husband at the time the order was made and continues to reside with him for three months thereafter, the order automatically comes to an end.

In the opinion of the court, that is what has happened in this case. The justices have sought to draw a distinction between a wife residing with her husband and a husband residing with his wife. I am afraid that is too subtle a distinction for me. If a husband resides with his wife, the wife resides with her husband, and vice versa. In the present case, no doubt, the parties are living at arms' length under the same roof, but they are living together under the same roof. As we pointed out in Evans v. Evans (1), and afterwards in Wheatley v. Wheatley (3), the words of the statute have to be given their ordinary meaning, and the court could not see how it could be said that the parties did not reside together when they were living in the same house together. In the present case the justices find that for a mistaken reason the wife has never asked her husband to leave the house. Under this Act, she could get an order while she was still living with him, and as soon as she got it she need only tell him to leave the house and bolt the door against him if he did not, or, perhaps, take proceedings in the county court. She never asked him to leave, as the justices have found, because she thought that, if she did, she would be guilty of desertion, but in such a case she would not be guilty of desertion without cause. As it is, at the present moment and ever since she got the order her husband has been living in her house by her leave and licence, and her reason for permitting him to do so is immaterial. If she withdrew the leave and licence and told him to go, and he did not do so, so that he became a trespasser, there would be very different considerations arising, and I think it might well be that in such a state of affairs the court would not regard the parties as living together because it would be very difficult to say that a householder was residing with a trespasser who was on the premises against the will of the householder, but in this case it is abundantly clear that the wife never has requested the husband to go and he is still there with her permission. In my opinion, therefore, she is still residing with him, the decisions in Evans v. Evans (1) and Wheatley v. Wheatley (3) apply, and the order has come to an end. The wife is not without remedy. She can either take proceedings in the Divorce Court or she can tell the husband to go. If he does not go, he will put himself at once in the wrong, and she can again go to the justices, and, I have no doubt, get another order. For these reasons I think a committal order cannot be made in this case because the order has come to an end.

JONES, J.: I agree.

PARKER, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: H. R. Hodder & Son (for the husband); E. P. Hanney (for the wife).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BECKER v. CROSBY CORPORATION.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.), May 9, 1952.]

Housing—Accommodation of working classes—Recovery of possession—Notice to quit—"Notice . . . proceeding from a local authority"—Signature by "clerk or lawful deputy"—Signature by housing manager—Housing Act, 1936 (c. 51), s. 164 (2).

In the course of the management of houses provided by them a local authority required possession of a house let by them to the appellant under the Housing Act, 1936, s. 83 (1), and a notice to quit was served on the appellant, the notice being signed by the housing manager of the authority. In proceedings by the authority to recover possession under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, HELD: by taking proceedings to recover possession of the property the local authority were exercising their powers under the Housing Act, 1936; Shelley v. London County Council, Harcourt v. London County Council ([1948] 2 All E.R. 898), followed; the notice to quit, therefore, was a notice "proceeding from a local authority under this Act" within the meaning of s. 164 (2) of the Act and must be signed by their clerk or his lawful deputy; and, in the absence of evidence that the housing manager was the lawful deputy of the clerk, the notice was bad.

FOR THE HOUSING ACT, 1936, s. 164 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 576.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Shelley v. London County Council. Harcourt v. London County Council, [1948] 2 All E.R. 898; [1949] A.C. 56; [1949] L.J.R. 57; 113 J.P. 1; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) West Ham Corpn. v. Benabo (Charles) & Sons, [1934] 2 K.B. 253; 103 L.J.K.B. 452; 151 L.T. 119; 98 J.P. 287; Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Lancashire justices.

On Sept. 28, 1951, at a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Liverpool, on an application by the housing manager of the respondent corporation under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1, the justices granted a warrant directing the constables to enter a tenement known as No. 66 Woodend Avenue, and deliver up possession thereof to the respondents. The premises had been let on July 23, 1951, by the respondents to the appellant on a weekly tenancy, and, in exercise of their powers of management under s. 83 (1) of the Housing Act, 1936, they now required possession. On Aug. 17, 1951, a notice to quit signed by the respondents' housing manager was served on the appellant, but he failed to deliver up possession, and on Sept. 6, 1951, the respondents served on him a notice of their intention to apply for a warrant under s. 1 of the Act of 1838, as extended by s. 156 (2) of the Housing Act, 1936. For the appellant it was contended, inter alia, that the notice to quit was invalid because it was not signed by the respondents' clerk or his lawful deputy as required by s. 164 (2) of the Housing Act, 1936. For the respondents it was contended that that subsection did not apply to a notice to quit. The justices, being of the opinion that the notice to quit was valid according to the general law and was not a notice within the meaning of s. 164 (2) of the Act of 1936, issued the warrant.

G. W. G. Jones for the tenant.

Squibb for the council.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The point which is taken in this case is that the notice to quit which was served on Aug. 17, 1951, to take effect on Aug. 27, 1951, was bad because it was signed by the housing manager of the corporation and not by the town clerk or by his lawful deputy. It is, therefore, necessary to look at three sections of the Housing Act, 1936, and to bear in mind the interpretation put on them by the House of Lords in Shelley v. London County Council. Harcourt v. London County Council (1). By s. 83 (1) it is provided:

"The general management, regulation, and control of houses provided by a local authority under this Part of this Act shall be vested in and exercised by the authority . . ."

A By s. 156 (2):

"Where a local authority, for the purpose of exercising their powers under any enactment relating to the housing of the working classes, require possession of any building or any part of a building of which they are the owners, then, whatever may be the value or rent of the building or part of a building, they may obtain possession thereof under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, as in the cases therein provided for, at any time after the tenancy of the occupier has expired, or has been determined."

B

That section gives to the local authority a very special right, because an ordinary landlord can only take proceedings under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, if the rent of the property does not exceed £20. By s. 164 (2) of the Housing Act, 1936, it is provided:

C

"A notice, demand, or other written document proceeding from a local authority under this Act shall be signed by their clerk or his lawful deputy."

In Shelley v. London County Council (1), the House of Lords decided that, in taking proceedings to recover possession of property to which the Housing Act, 1936, applies, the control and management of which is vested in the local authority, the local authority are exercising their powers under the Act. Therefore, it seems to me difficult to say that when they serve a notice to quit to get possession of such property they are not exercising their powers under the Act. The Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, indeed, expressly provides that it is only applicable where notice to quit has been served and expired. The corporation served a notice to quit, and took proceedings under the Act of 1838, showing thereby that they were exercising their powers under the Act. Therefore, in my opinion, it is impossible to say that the notice which they served was not a notice proceeding from a local authority under the Act of 1936. The housing manager swore that he had authority to give this notice. But that is not what is required. The Act requires that the notice shall be signed by the town clerk or his lawful deputy. There is no evidence that the housing manager was the lawful deputy of the town clerk, and, therefore, the point which has been taken on behalf of the appellant is good. The appeal must be allowed with costs.

D

E

F

JONES, J.: I agree.

PARKER, J.: I agree.

G

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Fortescue, Adshead & Guest, agents for J. W. Wall & Co., Liverpool (for appellant); Lees & Co., agents for H. O. Roberts, town clerk, Crosby (for the council).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

STACK v. CHURCH COMMISSIONERS FOR ENGLAND.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), April 29, 1952.]

Housing—Conversion of house into several tenements—"Conversion"—Structural alteration—Single-room "flatlets"—Effect on character of neighbourhood—Discretion of county court—Housing Act, 1936 (c. 51), s. 163.

The applicant, assignee of a house belonging to the respondents, found that he could not sub-let it as a single tenement, but could readily do so if it were converted into one-room tenements, and he applied to the county court under s. 163 of the Housing Act, 1936, to vary the terms of the lease which prohibited the conversion. The respondents contended that the applicant's proposed conversion into single-room "flatlets" instead of self-contained flats of two or more rooms would tend to lower the general character of the neighbourhood. They submitted that "conversion" meant structural alteration and that the court had no jurisdiction under s. 163 to vary the terms of the lease. The county court judge made an order granting relief to the applicant.

HELD: "conversion" in s. 163 did not import the necessity of structural alteration; the question whether a proposed conversion would tend to lower the character of the neighbourhood was one for the county court judge; and, he being satisfied on this question of fact, his order was right.

FOR THE HOUSING ACT, 1936, s. 163, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 576.

APPEAL by the respondents, the ground landlords, against an order made by His Honour JUDGE PUGH at Bloomsbury County Court on Feb. 1, 1952, varying the terms of the lease of a house granted by them to the applicant whereby he was prohibited from converting the house into separate tenements.

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and Denny for the respondents: The object of s. 163 of the Housing Act, 1936, was to enable a permanent physical conversion of property subject to a restrictive covenant to be made. The creation of tenements must not be confused with the conversion of a property into several dwelling-houses. The words of the section "if converted" could have been omitted if it had not been the intention of the Act that there should be an actual physical conversion. The language of the section was not apt to permit of a conversion merely by a different mode of letting, otherwise the tenant would be at liberty to create as many separate tenancies as he liked. The county court judge should have limited a number of tenancies into which the house could be converted, and the fact that he had not done so was to allow an alteration of the character of the property which was not in accord with the provisions of the Act of 1936.

Granville Sharp, Q.C., and Seuffert for the applicant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order made by His Honour JUDGE PUGH on an application made under s. 163 of the Housing Act, 1936, which reads:

"Where it is proved to the satisfaction of the county court on an application by the local authority or any person interested in a house that, owing to changes in the character of the neighbourhood in which the house is situate, the house cannot readily be let as a single tenement but could readily be let for occupation if converted into two or more tenements, and that, by reason of the provisions of the lease of or any restrictive covenant affecting the house, or otherwise, such conversion is prohibited or restricted, the court, after giving any person interested an opportunity of being heard, may vary the terms of the lease or other instrument imposing the prohibition or restriction so as to enable the house to be so converted subject to such conditions and upon such terms as the court may think just."

The house with which the application is concerned, 2 Belsize Park Gardens, Hampstead, is one of a number of houses in that neighbourhood owned by the respondents to the application, the Church Commissioners for England. In 1927 it was the subject-matter of a lease for 999 years granted by the respondents to the Royal London Society for Teaching and Training the Blind. There were various repairing and restrictive covenants into the details of which I will not go because the whole of the proceedings before us were on the basis that what the applicant required to do was prohibited by the lease, and, therefore, he would have been in breach unless he obtained relief from the conditions of the lease with regard to the matter in question. He was the assignee of the lease and it is not disputed that he was a person interested in the house within the meaning of the section. Having obtained a leasehold interest, he made this application on the ground that, owing to changes in the character of the neighbourhood in which the house was situate, it could not readily be let as a single tenement but it could readily be let for occupation if converted into two or more tenements, and by reason of the provisions of the lease such conversion was prohibited. When the matter came before the judge it was conceded by counsel for the respondents that there had been a change in the character of the neighbourhood so that the house could not readily be let as a single tenement but could readily be let for occupation if converted into two or more tenements, and there was evidence given as to the user of other houses in the neighbourhood.

The contest between the parties is this. The applicant wanted to sub-let the house as single-room "flatlets", as they were called in the evidence. He said that cooking facilities of some kind would be installed and also a wash basin and a sink. The idea was that these "flatlets" would be suitable as single rooms in which a person could live and cook food. As to the normal sanitary arrangements, water closets and bathrooms would be used by the occupants of these flatlets in common. The respondents' point was that they wanted the houses in this neighbourhood converted only into self-contained flats, that is to say, flats which had their own bathroom and sanitary arrangements, and, no doubt, usually more than one room—two or three-roomed flats. Most of the houses nearby have been so converted, and it was the respondents' policy when they granted new leases to insist on such conversion if a house was not suitable to be let as a single tenement, and they submitted that that would be in accordance with the character of the neighbourhood whereas letting single rooms would tend to lower the general character of the neighbourhood. In giving judgment the learned judge said:

"Once it had been conceded by the respondents that this house could only be let if converted into two or more tenements, I could see no possible objection to the principle of what one of the respondents' witnesses called 'fragmentation' being applied to it, especially in view of the notorious difficulties that lie in the way of young people seeking living accommodation today."

A point taken before the judge is, I think, the only point available before us. Counsel for the respondents took as a point of law that "converted" in this section must mean a structural alteration. The judge said he did not agree. He held that

"to turn a house into one in which each room has its own cooking and washing arrangements is a conversion. I do not think this section requires a structural alteration."

Counsel for the respondents emphasised that what s. 163 is dealing with is the conversion of a house, and that it would be wrong to treat those words as covering a purely functional division—i.e., without any structural alteration letting rooms separately as they are. No doubt, the section was intended to cover cases where structural alteration was necessary, and that as a rule would make a more serious inroad on the covenants in the lease than a mere breach of a covenant with regard to letting because the breach of a covenant with regard to letting is not incurable, whereas, if there is a structural alteration and what was a single twelve-roomed house is turned into four or more self-contained flats, what the landlord will get at the end of the lease is something different from what he demised. So, words had to be used to cover that case, and I should have thought that, prima facie, the greater included the less. Parliament was prepared to give power to the county court to sanction the greater inroad, and unless there were express words I should have thought that covered the lesser inroad.

I do not find any difficulty in construing the word "converted", which is a wide word, to cover the type of change which is contemplated here. It did, indeed, involve some structural alteration. It is very difficult to conceive of a case in which the letting of a single room for occupation by people would not involve some structural alteration, but, even if, owing to a multiplicity of bathrooms and sanitary arrangements, a house could be let off as two or more tenements, self-contained flats, without any structural alteration, I cannot see why the county court should not have jurisdiction to deal with an application of that kind under the words used in the section. When I put to counsel for the respondents what was the policy, as it were, which sanctioned the greater, but excluded the less, he submitted that one ought to find in this section a desire to maintain housing standards. In a sense, however, the section contemplates the lowering of housing standards in that it provides for families being housed in fewer rooms than they were housed in when the whole house was let as a single tenement. The section leaves it to the court to decide what shall be sanctioned. I think such questions as to standard, whether for instance a house is to be turned into five or six-roomed flats, or two-roomed flats with their own sanitary arrangements, or one-roomed flats fitted with washing equipment, are questions which under this section Parliament has left to be determined by the county court judge. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that in this case the judge had jurisdiction to make the order which he made, and, having read his judgment, I cannot see any other possible ground on which we should interfere with the conclusion to which he came. I think this appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: J. H. MacDonnell (for the applicant); Milles, Day & Co. (for the respondents).

[Reported by D. W. O. LAWRENCE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

RELIANCE CAR FACILITIES, LTD. v. RODING MOTORS (a firm).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.J.J.), April 29, 30, 1952.]

Hire-Purchase—Recourse agreement—In event of termination of hiring agreement dealer to re-purchase hired car from finance company—“Termination of agreement”—Finance company requesting dealer to re-possess car, but not informing hirer that hiring was terminated.

The defendants, a firm of motor car dealers, sold to the plaintiffs, a finance company, a car which the plaintiffs thereupon let on hire-purchase to a customer of the defendants. The hire-purchase agreement provided that “should the hirer make default in any monthly payment” the plaintiffs had a right “to declare the hiring terminated”. At the same time a “recourse agreement” was made between the plaintiffs and the defendants whereby the defendants were to re-purchase the car from the plaintiffs “in the event of the termination of the hiring agreement”. The hirer defaulted in payment under the hire-purchase agreement, and the plaintiffs pressed for payment. As they could not obtain satisfaction, they requested the defendants to re-possess the car as their agents, and informed them that they, the plaintiffs, would send them an invoice for the re-purchase price within fourteen days. This they did, but they did not at any time notify the hirer that the hiring was terminated. In a claim by the plaintiffs against the defendants for the agreed re-purchase price of the car,

HELD: to be effective a declaration under the hire-purchase agreement that the hiring was terminated must be communicated to the hirer or there must be an unequivocal act equivalent to a declaration to the hirer; as the plaintiffs had not declared the hiring terminated by any communication to the hirer or by any such unequivocal act, the hiring had not terminated; and, therefore, the recourse agreement had not come into operation and the defendants were not liable to the plaintiffs for the re-purchase price of the motor car.

North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham ([1950] 1 All E.R. 780), distinguished.

AS TO TERMINATION OF HIRE-PURCHASE AGREEMENT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 16, p. 513, para. 756; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 3, pp. 95-98, Nos. 256-266.

F Cases referred to:

- (1) North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham, [1950] 1 All E.R. 780; [1950] 2 K.B. 7; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Dumper's Case, (1603), 4 Co. Rep. 119 b; 76 E.R. 1110; sub nom. Dumper v. Syms, Cro. Eliz. 815; 78 E.R. 1042; 31 Digest, Replacement, 436, 5639.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of SELLERS, J., dated Feb. 11, 1952, holding the defendants liable to the plaintiffs for the purchase price of a motor car due under a “recourse agreement” made between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The judge held that, on the authority of North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham (1) ([1950] 1 All E.R. 780), the hiring of the motor car by the plaintiffs to the hirer had been terminated, and so the recourse agreement had come into operation. The defendants appealed.

Hallis for the defendants.

W. M. F. Hudson for the plaintiffs.

SINGLETON, L.J.: DENNING, L.J., will deliver the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J.: The defendants, who were motor car dealers, had a Dodge utility van for sale. A customer of theirs was minded to buy it, but had not the money to pay for it, so the parties went to a finance company, the plaintiffs. As a result, the defendants sold the car to the plaintiffs and then the plaintiffs made a hire-purchase agreement with the defendants' customer, and, in addition, the defendants entered into a "recourse agreement" with the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs now sue the defendants on the recourse agreement.

The object of the recourse agreement was to make the defendants responsible for seeing that the hirer duly paid the instalments to the plaintiffs, but, instead of being by way of guarantee, it was carried out by an agreement of re-purchase. In case of default by the hirer, the defendants were to buy the vehicle back from the plaintiffs. Under the recourse agreement it was provided that "in the event of the termination of the hiring agreement" the defendants were to re-possess the vehicle and purchase it back at a price equal to the balance due under the hiring agreement. The words "in the event of the termination of the hiring agreement" are clearly a condition precedent to the recourse agreement coming into operation at all. The question is whether that condition precedent has been fulfilled. Was the hiring agreement terminated? The plaintiffs say that it was terminated under cl. 3, which provided:

"Should the hirer make default in any monthly payment as agreed or commit any other breach of this agreement . . . the owner shall have the right at any time to declare the hiring terminated and to re-take possession of the said motor vehicle."

The hire-purchase agreement was made on Oct. 15, 1948. The hirer paid the first instalment in November, 1948, but did not pay any more. Six months or more elapsed without the hirer paying a penny. The plaintiffs then wrote to the hirer asking for a cheque for the outstanding instalments and said:

"Unless this matter is attended to without delay we shall have no alternative but to put into effect para. 3 of the hire-purchase agreement."

Thereupon the hirer sent a cheque for £100, but it was dishonoured. So the plaintiffs wrote to the hirer again and said:

"We must ask you to call and see us in respect of your hire-purchase account without further delay."

The hirer did not call. Then took place the act which is said to terminate the hiring and on which it is said that the recourse agreement came into operation. It is a letter of July 28, 1949, sent, not to the hirer, but to the defendants. The plaintiffs told the defendants that they could not get the hirer to meet his obligations. Then they added:

"As we hold a 100 per cent. dealer recourse on this vehicle we must request you to re-possess this as our agents. On the expiration of fourteen days from this date we shall forward you an invoice for the balance due."

The defendants did not re-possess the vehicle. They complained that the plaintiffs had not been diligent in pressing the hirer for the money. The plaintiffs took no notice of the complaint. They simply sent an invoice to the defendants for the amount outstanding and demanded it as the price of the vehicle as though it had been sold to the defendants.

The whole question is whether that letter of July 28, 1949, from the plaintiffs to the defendants terminated the hiring. It was sent, not to the hirer, but only to the defendants. Was that sufficient? If it did terminate the hiring, it is quite clear that the recourse agreement came into operation. If it did not terminate the agreement, then, of course, the recourse agreement did not come into operation. SELLERS, J., made it clear that, apart from the authorities, he would have held that the hiring was not terminated, because there had been no notice sent to the hirer, but he thought that, by reason of the decision in North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham (1), he was constrained to come to a different conclusion. In my view, SELLERS, J.'s, own unaided judgment was correct. This hiring agreement could not be terminated simply by a letter from the plaintiffs to the defendants.

I put this to counsel for the plaintiffs in the course of the case: "Does your argument mean that, if the plaintiffs wrote a letter to a garage asking them to collect the car, or if one clerk in their office told another clerk in the office that the agreement was terminated, it would at once automatically terminate?"

A He was forced to say: "Yes". That rather reminds me of the solicitor's office which was said to have an informing clerk and a believing clerk for the purpose of making affidavits on information and belief. Here you might have a declaring clerk and a hearing clerk for the purpose of determining such an agreement. In my opinion, under the terms of this recourse agreement, to terminate the hiring agreement there must be a declaration by the plaintiffs communicated to the hirer, or some unequivocal act equivalent to a declaration to the hirer, such as an actual re-taking of possession. Nothing short of that will suffice because a clause of this kind is like a forfeiture clause in a lease, which, if there is a breach, does not terminate the letting automatically. A breach only makes the letting voidable at the election of the lessor, and there must be some unequivocal act by him evincing his election before it can be said to be actually terminated: see the notes to Dunpor's case (2). In this case the agreement provides the nature of the act: the plaintiffs must "declare the hiring terminated". A mere declaration in the mind of the party, or even to his agent or a third party, will not do. It must be a declaration communicated to the hirer who is affected by it, or an unequivocal act which is equivalent to a declaration to the hirer. For that reason I am satisfied that the mere communication of the letter of July 28, 1949, to the defendants was not a termination of the hiring. B The recourse agreement, therefore, never came into operation.

I must say a word about the case on which SELLERS, J., was persuaded to decide otherwise—North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham (1). In that case the hirer had himself sold the car in complete defiance of the agreement of bailment. He had sold it through an auctioneer and the claim was against the auctioneer for conversion of the goods. To sustain a claim in conversion, it is essential that the bailor should have the right to immediate possession or that the hiring should be determinable at will. It is not necessary that it should in fact be terminated. In that case the hiring was determinable at will by reason of the sale having been made. It was not automatically terminated. In none of the judgments is to be found any statement that the hiring was terminated, whereas in the present case, in order that the recourse agreement should operate, it must be actually terminated. There is an observation of ASQUITH, L.J., which, I think, must have led SELLERS, J., to take the view he did. ASQUITH, L.J., said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 783):

"... the question, to my mind, reduces itself to this: On the true construction of this contract, was any notice needed to terminate the agreement?"

G Reading that passage alone it would look as though the lord justice was holding that no notice was necessary to terminate the agreement, but when one reads the judgment as a whole, particularly the last few words of the judgment of ASQUITH, L.J., and the judgment of COHEN, L.J., it becomes plain that the ratio decidendi of that case was, not that the agreement had been terminated, but that it was determinable at will by reason of the sale which had taken place. H That being so, the case is distinguishable from the present, because here it is necessary that the hiring agreement should be terminated and there has never been a declaration within cl. 3 sufficient to terminate it. For those reasons, in my opinion, the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants in the action.

HODSON, L.J.: On Oct. 15, 1948, the plaintiffs entered into a hiring agreement with a hirer in relation to a motor car, and the question is whether the hiring agreement has been terminated. This question arises because, by what is called a recourse agreement dated Oct. 16, 1948, entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the defendants undertook, in the event of the termination of the hiring agreement, to re-possess the vehicle and purchase it back at the request of the plaintiffs. The learned judge clearly would have found in favour of the defendants had he not been persuaded to do otherwise by having cited to him North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham (1). He said this:

A

B

C

D

E

F

G

H

"Under the general law a contract, though broken, does not terminate automatically. It is left open for the party who has the right to treat the contract as at an end, if it is a fundamental breach, either to treat that as a termination of the contract or to ignore it and treat the contract as still subsisting . . . But in the case of the North Central Wagon & Finance Co., Ltd. v. Graham (1), a clause very similar to this one in its effect was brought into consideration."

The clause under consideration is cl. 3 of the hiring agreement which contains the words "the owner shall have the right at any time to declare the hiring terminated", whereas the words in the North Central Wagon case (1), which dealt with a hiring agreement, were "may terminate the hiring." In the present case nothing was done by the plaintiffs vis-à-vis the hirer to terminate the hiring. So, by the ordinary law of contract, the contract was not terminated, and it could not, therefore, be properly said that by the letter of July 28, 1949, written by the plaintiffs to the defendants, any termination could have been brought about, because that was a letter not written to the hirer at all. For myself I think that it is unnecessary to go into the nice question whether there is any difference in the wording of the particular contracts—between "declare the hiring terminated" or "may terminate the hiring." SELLERS, J., felt himself constrained to consider that distinction, but I think that there is the fundamental difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs that, on any view, the contract has not been terminated.

The decision in the North Central Wagon case (1) was not one, in my view, that compelled the learned judge to find otherwise. I think the effect of that decision, to which SINGLETON, L.J., was a party, was that, on the breach by the hirer of his stipulations under the agreement, the owners had the right, not merely to terminate the agreement, but to the immediate possession of the motor car, their right to possession arising as soon as the defendant was instructed to sell the car. There is no finding of the court in that case that the agreement in question had actually been terminated, but merely that there was a right to terminate, and, accordingly, a right to the immediate possession of the motor car which had been sold. That is put shortly by COHEN, L.J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 784), founding himself on a passage in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 1, p. 736, para. 1211:

"The act of the bailee in doing something inconsistent with the terms of the contract terminates the bailment, causing the possessory title to revert to the bailor, and entitling him to maintain an action of trover."

I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree, and I would base my judgment solely on the fact that no question can arise under that which is called a recourse agreement until the termination of the hiring. Clause 3 of the agreement of hiring provides that in certain events the owner shall have the right at any time to declare the hiring terminated. It is said on behalf of the plaintiffs that that was done by a letter of July 28, 1949, addressed by the plaintiffs to the defendants who were not parties to the hiring agreement at all. I do not think that that letter of July 28 can be read as terminating the hiring or declaring it terminated. Before that can be done under the terms of this hiring agreement, it seems to me that there must be a declaration, or notice, to the hirer, or some act towards him showing unequivocally that the hiring agreement was terminated.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Albin Hunt & Stein (for the defendants); J. H. Fellowes (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NOTE.

DAVIES v. FORTIOR, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Donovan, J.), April 28, 29, 1952.]

Negligence—Evidence—Res gestae—Fatal accident to workman—Subsequent death—Statement by workman immediately after accident.

ACTION for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was the widow of a former employee of the defendant company and brought the action under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, for her own benefit and that of her child, and also under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, for the benefit of the employee's estate. The defendant company were metal workers engaged, inter alia, in chromium plating processes at their premises, which were a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937. On or about Nov. 6, 1948, the employee was working in the processes concerned with the chromium plating of sheets of copper, when he fell from a platform into a bath of chromic acid. He died on Nov. 8. The plaintiff alleged that the employee's death was occasioned by the defendant company's negligence and breach of statutory duties, in failing to provide a safe place to work in, in failing to provide adequate supervision and inspection by a competent person and a safe system of work, and in failing to comply with the Factories Act, 1937, s. 18 and s. 26, and the Chromium Plating Regulations, 1931 (S.R. & O., 1931, No. 455), reg. 3, in relation to the process and the bath. The defendant company denied that they had been guilty of negligence or of any breach of statutory duty or that the death of the employee had been occasioned thereby or in the manner alleged, and said that it was occasioned solely by, or alternatively contributed to by, the negligence of the employee, who was a foreman, in failing to keep any or any proper look-out for his own safety, in failing to wear the protective clothing and equipment provided, and in causing or permitting himself to fall into the bath.

Evidence at the hearing showed that no one witnessed the accident and there was no direct evidence to show how the employee fell into the bath. To support an inference that the employee had been guilty of some negligent conduct, e.g., sitting on the guard rail of the bath, the defendant company sought to give evidence that, within a period variously estimated by the witnesses at from a few seconds to two minutes after he had been assisted out of the bath, he had said several times "I shouldn't have done it".

Beney, Q.C., and Joseph Jackson for the plaintiff.

Marven Everett, Q.C., and Tudor Evans for the defendant company.

DONOVAN, J., held that what the employee said immediately after the accident was admissible evidence as part of the res gestae. The action was finally settled.

Solicitors: Radcliffes & Co. (for the plaintiff); E. P. Rugg & Co. (for the defendant company).

F.A.A.

CHIPPERFIELD v. CHIPPERFIELD.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Pearce, J.), April 30, 1952.]

Justices—Custody—Revocation of order in wife's favour—No misconduct by wife—Welfare of child paramount consideration—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925 (c. 45), s. 1.

On June 22, 1951, justices made an order in the wife's favour under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts, granting her (inter alia) the custody of the child of the marriage. On Jan. 9, 1952, the husband's application to revoke or vary that part of the order relating to custody was dismissed by the justices on the ground that, as there was no evidence of misconduct by the wife, in view of the decision in Cobbe v. Cobbe (1909) (73 J.P. 208), they had no jurisdiction to interfere with the order.

HELD: since it had been enacted by the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, s. 1, that: "Where . . . the custody . . . of an infant . . . is in question, the court, in deciding that question, shall regard the welfare of the infant as the first and paramount consideration . . ." the decision in Cobbe v. Cobbe was no longer good law, and, therefore, the justices had misdirected themselves in law and their dismissal of the application must be set aside.

FOR THE GUARDIANSHIP OF INFANTS ACT, 1925, s. 1, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, p. 955.

Case referred to:

(1) Cobbe v. Cobbe, (1909), 73 J.P. 208; 27 Digest 566, 6251.

APPEAL by the husband against the dismissal by justices for the Highgate petty sessional division on Jan. 9, 1952, of his application to revoke or vary an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts, dated June 22, 1951, made by the same court in the wife's favour, in so far as that order related to the custody of the child of the marriage.

P. A. Bruce for the husband.

Vincent for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is an appeal by a husband against the dismissal by the justices for the Highgate petty sessional division of his application to revoke or vary an order made in favour of the wife by the same court on June 22, 1951, on the ground of desertion, whereby the husband was ordered to pay maintenance to the wife at the rate of £2 a week, she was given custody of the child of the marriage, and a further sum of 20s. a week maintenance for the child was ordered to be paid by the husband. By his summons the husband wishes to have the order in favour of the wife cancelled so far as it relates to custody, so that, in effect, the custody of the child, a daughter, will revert to him, though, of course, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts, it is not possible to make a positive order for custody in favour of a husband as would be the case if the summons were under the Guardianship of Infants Acts. It appears that the Highgate justices are no longer the proper tribunal to deal with a summons under the Guardianship of Infants Acts because neither of the spouses is any longer resident in their jurisdiction, and that is why the application took the form it did—an application for the revocation or variation of the existing custody order.

The case raises a pure question of law, which can be simply stated—whether the decision of this court in Cobbe v. Cobbe (1), is still law. Before the justices the point was taken for the wife that under that decision they had no jurisdiction to interfere with this order for custody unless evidence were laid before them that the wife had been guilty of misconduct. They accepted that submission, and it is said that they were wrong in doing so. Nobody suggests that the wife has been guilty of any misconduct, giving that word its widest sense and not limiting it only to adultery. What is said is that the decision in Cobbe v. Cobbe (1) can no longer be regarded as law, having regard to the express provision of s. 1 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, whereby:

A “Where in any proceeding before any court (whether or not a court within the meaning of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886) the custody or upbringing of an infant, or the administration of any property belonging to or held on trust for an infant, or the application of the income thereof, is in question, the court, in deciding that question, shall regard the welfare of the infant as the first and paramount consideration, and shall not take into consideration whether from any other point of view the claim of the father, B or any right at common law possessed by the father, in respect of such custody, upbringing, administration or application is superior to that of the mother, or the claim of the mother is superior to that of the father.”

C The substance of the decision in Cobbe v. Cobbe (1) is that when magistrates had once given the custody of a child to a wife under an order which was equivalent to a judicial separation they had no power to transfer the custody of the child to the husband unless there was evidence that the wife had been guilty of some misconduct, and that, as that had not been suggested in that case, an order varying the original order could not stand. It seems to me that, although Cobbe v. Cobbe (1) is still referred to in well-known text-books as if it were the law, it cannot now be so because that case decides that on any application to vary a custody order made under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) D Acts the overriding consideration, the condition precedent to the granting of the application, is that it should be proved that the wife has been guilty of misconduct, and I understand that there is authority which indicates that the misconduct need not necessarily be adultery.

E I do not think that such a decision as that can stand in view of the express wording of s. 1 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, which says that the paramount consideration shall be something entirely different, namely, the welfare of the child. It is obvious that in certain cases the two issues may conflict, and it is well recognised in LUSHINGTON'S SUMMARY JURISDICTION (MARRIED WOMEN) ACTS, 3rd ed., c. 19, that, for example, a husband may apply to have the whole order set aside under s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, which, unless one or other of the exceptions added to s. 7
F by the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, s. 2 (1), applies, makes it compulsory to discharge the order on proof of an act of adultery since the making of the order. In my opinion, in considering whether, with the maintenance, or the non-cohabitation clause, or whatever else may be in the order, the order for custody should be varied, it would still be necessary to give effect to the paramount consideration: What is in the best interests of the G welfare of the child in the circumstances of the case? In my opinion, the decision in Cobbe v. Cobbe (1) cannot survive the passing of s. 1 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925. The point, therefore, on which the justices dismissed the husband's summons was a bad point, and the dismissal must be set aside.

H PEARCE, J.: Since Cobbe v. Cobbe (1) was decided the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, has been passed. Section 1 of that Act is deliberately framed in the widest terms to secure consideration of the infant's interest in any court where its custody or upbringing is at stake. In RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed.,
p. 458, Cobbe v. Cobbe (1) is still cited as an authority for the proposition that a custody order in favour of a wife may only be varied on evidence of the wife's misconduct. If that were still the law, the paramount consideration would be whether the wife had committed misconduct, whereas Parliament has deliberately stated that the welfare of the infant shall be the paramount consideration. Since the Act has expressly said that the court shall not take into consideration whether from any other point of view the claim of the father is superior to that of the mother or the claim of the mother is superior to that of the father, the court should not take into consideration the personal right of the mother to retain a custody order that she has obtained, a right that in Cobbe v. Cobbe (1) was considered to be the deciding factor. Cobbe v. Cobbe (1) is, therefore, no longer good law. In considering whether they shall vary a custody order, the paramount question for the justices is, not the conduct of the parents, but the interests of the child. The conduct of the parents is obviously relevant to this so far as it affects the child, but it is not the deciding factor.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Pennington & Son, agents for Church, Bruce & Co., Gravesend (for the husband); Donovan J. Smalley (for the wife).

[Reported by A. T. HOOLAHAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

McMASTER & ANOTHER v. BYRNE.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Goddard, Lord Normand, Lord Radcliffe, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), March 10, 11, 12, 13, April 24, 1952.]

Solicitor—Breach of duty—Purchase from client of shares in company—Failure to disclose negotiations for sale of controlling interest in company.

In 1933 M. and two associates, P. and E., promoted a company, S.P., Ltd., in Canada, M. and P. receiving one thousand common shares in the company and E. five hundred. The promoters then acquired another company to which they transferred their holdings in S.P., Ltd., receiving in exchange shares in the holding company. The respondent, who was a solicitor, was employed by the promoters in the formation of S.P., Ltd., the acquisition of the holding company, and the transfer to that company of the promoters' shares in S.P., Ltd. In 1936 M., who had become a director of S.P., Ltd., on its formation, resigned from that company, and in 1939 he set up in business on his own account. Thereafter he made frequent attempts to realise his interest in S.P., Ltd., as represented by his shares in the holding company. In 1944 M.'s business was formed into a company, M.P., Ltd., the respondent acting for M. in its incorporation. In the same year the respondent drew up M.'s will, under which he was appointed one of the executors, and the will was placed in his custody. In 1946 M. granted P. an option to purchase his (M.'s) shares in the holding company for $30,000. At about the same time negotiations, conducted by P., were opened for the sale of a controlling interest in S.P., Ltd., to an English company. On Mar. 21, 1947, the respondent had an interview with P. at which the respondent was informed of the negotiations with the English company. At that interview he obtained from P. an assignment of P.'s option in M.'s shares. On Mar. 22, 1947, the respondent had a meeting with M. and obtained from him a fresh option on his shares. It was doubtful whether at that meeting the respondent disclosed to M. all the facts of which he was aware regarding the negotiations for the sale of S.P., Ltd. On Apr. 8, 1947, the respondent exercised his option and purchased the shares from M. for $30,000. On June 2 the English company's offer to buy a controlling interest in S.P., Ltd. was accepted, and on completion of the sale the respondent received $127,000 for the holding, representing a profit of $97,000. In July, 1947, M. executed a codicil to his will appointing his two sons executors in place of the respondent and removing the will from his custody. In 1948 M. died. In an action by his executors against the respondent for an account of the profit made on the transaction,

Held: although the respondent was not acting as solicitor for M. on Mar. 22 when obtaining the option from him, in the circumstances the confidence arising from the relationship of solicitor and client which had previously existed between them must be taken to have continued to exist on that date; it was the duty of the respondent to disclose to M. all the material facts within his knowledge, and, although M. had continually tried to dispose of his shares, the necessity for disclosure was to be tested, not by his probable reaction to the information, but by the natural reaction of a reasonable man; the onus was on the respondent to prove that he had discharged his duty to M., and, there being doubt on this point, there must be a new trial.

A Dictum of PARKER, J., in Allison v. Clayhills (1907) (97 L.T. 712) approved and applied.

Decision of COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO ([1951] 1 D.L.R. 593) reversed.

AS TO TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN SOLICITOR AND CLIENT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, p. 116, para. 163; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 42, pp. 76, 77, 79-86, Nos. 672-683, 710-772.

Cases referred to :

(1) Allison v. Clayhills, (1907), 97 L.T. 709; 42 Digest 85, 765.

(2) Wright v. Carter, [1903] 1 Ch. 27; 72 L.J.Ch. 138; 87 L.T. 624; 42 Digest 79, 702.

(3) Edwards v. Meyrick, (1842), 2 Hare, 60; 12 L.J.Ch. 49; 67 E.R. 25; 42 Digest 82, 738.

(4) Montesquieu v. Sandys, (1811), 18 Ves. 302; 34 E.R. 331; 42 Digest 84, 761.

D APPEAL by the plaintiffs against an order of the Court of Appeal for Ontario dated Nov. 8, 1950, and reported [1951] 1 D.L.R. 593, dismissing an appeal by them against an order of SMILY, J., dated Apr. 27, 1950, whereby he gave judgment for the respondent in an action by Harry J. McMaster, who died on Nov. 30, 1948, and whose executors, the appellants, continued the action.

E McMaster was the holder of forty per cent. of the shares of a holding company known as Carleton Securities, Ltd., which owned half of the common shares of a company, Sovereign Potters, Ltd. The respondent, who was solicitor for and secretary of the latter company and who had also acted as solicitor for McMaster, purchased all McMaster's shares in Carleton Securities, Ltd. and later, when an English company, Johnson Brothers (Hanley), Ltd. bought the business of Sovereign Potters, Ltd. and in connection therewith purchased all the shares of Carleton Securities, Ltd., the respondent realised a substantial profit. McMaster claimed an account of this profit on the ground that the purchase by the respondent from him was in breach of the fiduciary duty which, it was alleged, the respondent owed him by reason of the confidential relationship as solicitor and client that existed between them. The respondent denied that at the material time the relationship of solicitor and client existed between him and McMaster, and further that the negotiations for the sale to Johnson Brothers (Hanley), Ltd. of the shares in Sovereign Potters, Ltd. were a matter of common knowledge among the shareholders of Sovereign Potters, Ltd. and Carleton Securities, Ltd., including McMaster, and that on Mar. 22, 1947, when the respondent obtained an option to purchase McMaster's shares, the respondent disclosed to him all the relevant facts known to the respondent in connection with the sale. SMILY, J., held that the relationship of solicitor and client existed between the parties at the time of the transaction on Mar. 22, 1947, and that the respondent was at that time in possession of all the information then available concerning the negotiations for the sale. The judge, however, dismissed the action on the ground that, in his opinion, no information which the respondent could give to McMaster would have affected McMaster's decision to sell, and, consequently, there was no withholding of relevant information. The judge also considered the transaction was fair and would not have been affected by proper legal advice. The Court of Appeal held that the relationship of solicitor and client did not exist at the time of the transaction and for that reason dismissed the appeal.

A. C. Heighington, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Gahan, Q.C., for the appellants.

C. F. H. Carson, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Lord Hailsham for the respondent.

April 24. LORD COHEN: This is an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal for Ontario affirming the decision of SMILY, J., who dismissed the appellants' action with costs. The action was commenced by the late Harry J. McMaster on Sept. 15, 1947. By his statement of claim McMaster claimed from the respondent, who is a barrister and solicitor practising in the city of Hamilton, an accounting of the profits derived by the respondent from a transaction between them relating to one thousand shares in a company called Carleton Securities, Ltd.

The history of the matter (stating for the moment only facts which are not in dispute) is as follows. In the year 1933 McMaster and two associates by name Pulkingham and Etherington promoted a company called Sovereign Potters, Ltd. The capital of that company consisted of a number of preference and five thousand common shares. Of the common shares half were issued to the group who provided finance for the company, the other half being issued to the three promoters. Pulkingham and McMaster each received one thousand shares and Etherington five hundred shares. The respondent acted in the formation of the company on behalf of all the interested parties, and he became, and has at all material times been, the secretary of the company, Sovereign Potters, Ltd. McMaster was anxious to tie up the holdings of the three promoters so that there could not be a majority interest formed against any one of them. With this in view the promoters took over a company, Carleton Securities, Ltd., and transferred to it their respective holdings of common shares in Sovereign Potters, Ltd. They received in exchange shares in Carleton Securities, Ltd., McMaster receiving one thousand shares. Again the respondent acted in the taking over of Carleton Securities, Ltd. for the purpose above mentioned and was appointed secretary of it. In this case, however, it appears that he never, in fact, acted as secretary. McMaster became a director and production superintendent of Sovereign Potters, Ltd. on its formation and remained in that capacity until November, 1936, when he fell out with his colleagues and resigned. Under an agreement with Sovereign Potters, Ltd., McMaster was under obligation not for three years after the termination of his service directly or indirectly to enter into competition with Sovereign Potters, Ltd., within the dominion of Canada. When that period expired in 1939, McMaster set up in business on his own account in Dundas under the name of McMaster Potteries. In 1944 that business was transferred to McMaster Potters, Ltd., and again the respondent acted for McMaster in the incorporation of the company. In the same year the respondent advised McMaster as to the probable liability for succession duty on his estate when he died. In 1946 McMaster, acting, no doubt, on behalf of McMaster Potters, Ltd., consulted the respondent as to the liability of that company for excise duty. Going back to the year 1944, in that year the respondent drew up McMaster's will under which he was appointed one of the executors and trustees, the other being McMaster's wife. That will was duly executed and remained in the respondent's custody until after the transactions which gave rise to the present dispute. It was then removed from his custody, and on Nov. 16, 1948, McMaster executed a codicil appointing his two sons executors and trustees in place of the executors named in the original will. On Dec. 6, 1946, the respondent's firm rendered an account to McMaster Potters, Ltd., for their services aforesaid to that company and to McMaster personally. The respondent says that, apart from the matters mentioned in that account, the only other matters in respect of which he acted for McMaster were (a) in 1938 the patentability of a wrench which McMaster had designed, and (b) in 1945 the purchase of a house. He says that on the latter occasion he had nothing to do with the negotiations : he merely dealt with the conveyancing business.

A Robert McMaster deposed to a number of visits and telephone calls by McMaster to the respondent. The respondent did not agree as to the frequency of these events, and maintained that, if and so far as McMaster ever raised any question with him about Carleton Securities, Ltd., it was in his capacity as secretary of Sovereign Potters, Ltd., two thousand five hundred common shares of which constituted the only asset of Carleton Securities, Ltd. The evidence of Robert McMaster shows that on three occasions his father employed a solicitor other than the respondent. According to Robert McMaster's evidence, on the first occasion it was because it was thought that the solicitor concerned, Mr. Braden, could exert influence to procure some plant required for the family business. On the second occasion the solicitor, Mr. Lampard, was employed for some unspecified business at the request of one of McMaster's daughters. On the third occasion B Mr. Shaver was employed by both vendor and purchaser on the acquisition by McMaster Potters, Ltd. of a piece of land. It is clear that from the time McMaster resigned his posts with Sovereign Potters, Ltd., he was anxious to realise his interest in that company which was represented by his holding of shares in C Carleton Securities, Ltd. He appears to have raised that matter each year at the annual meeting of Carleton Securities, Ltd., which was held to discuss how the voting interest of that company on Sovereign Potters, Ltd., should be exercised. Ultimately McMaster granted Pulkingham an option to purchase his shares in Carleton Securities, Ltd. for $30,000. The option was granted on or about Sept. 19, 1946, and was a ninety days option. It was renewed for a further one hundred days. It appears, though this is not absolutely clear, that on Mar. 21, 1947, the option had not expired, but was due to expire in the course of a day or two.

D There had been several feelers for the purchase of the business of Sovereign Potters, Ltd., but nothing had come of any of them before the autumn of 1946. An intimation was then received that an English company, Johnson Brothers (Hanley), Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as Johnsons), might be interested in obtaining a controlling interest in Sovereign Potters, Ltd. This was followed by E a visit by Mr. Johnson, a director of Johnsons, to the plant of Sovereign Potters, Ltd. Pulkingham, who was conducting the negotiations on behalf of Sovereign Potters, Ltd., intimated to Johnsons that he doubted whether the board of Sovereign Potters, Ltd. would recommend the sale of the whole of the shares of Sovereign Potters, Ltd. for less than $1,500,000. Early in March, 1947, Mr. F Johnson telephoned to Pulkingham that his company was sincerely interested in buying control and early in the same month he telegraphed that a lower price namely, $160 per share for the preference shares, and $150 per share for the common shares, representing, as their Lordships are told, a total sum of over $1,000,000, might be acceptable to Johnsons. By the same cable he asked Pulkingham to recommend a Canadian solicitor to act for Johnsons and intimated G that a draft agreement would be sent. Pulkingham asked the respondent to suggest a solicitor and on Mar. 6, the respondent suggested Messrs. Mason Foulds, Davidson & Gale. Pulkingham and the respondent discussed the situation and decided that a board meeting of Sovereign Potters, Ltd., must be convened to discuss the position. This was summoned for Mar. 28 and the facts set forth above and other relevant facts were embodied by the respondent in a letter dated Mar. 27 which he circulated to all the directors of Sovereign Potters, H Ltd. It is not clear how many of the above-mentioned facts were known to the respondent before Mar. 22, 1947, nor is it clear what facts (if any) relating to the Johnson negotiations were communicated by the respondent to McMaster at the interview on Mar. 22, 1947, mentioned below. It seems, however, that at a meeting of Carleton Securities, Ltd. on Dec. 10, 1946, Etherington had advised McMaster not to be in a hurry to sell his stock as there might be negotiations to sell Sovereign Potters, Ltd.

On Mar. 21, 1947, the respondent had an interview with Pulkingham at which he gave the respondent some information about the negotiations with Johnsons. He also told the respondent about his option on McMaster's shares in Carleton Securities, Ltd. The respondent obtained an assignment of this option and fixed an appointment with McMaster for the following day, Mar. 22, 1947. At that interview at which there was also present McMaster's son, Robert, the respondent obtained from McMaster a fresh option for thirty days at the same price, $30,000. He also got McMaster to sign a document containing a statement that McMaster knew that the respondent was supposed to share in the promoters' shares in Sovereign Potters, Ltd., having been told this by Etherington on several occasions. The respondent exercised the option on Apr. 8, 1947. It seems clear that, from the time he obtained the option, the respondent played a very active and helpful part in the negotiations with Johnsons. There were several hitches—for instance, to meet the views of the holders of preference shares as to the division of the spoils as between the preference shares and the common shares in Sovereign Potters, Ltd., an adjustment in the price per share for each class of shares became necessary. Again, there was difficulty in securing for Johnsons the Canadian dollars required to complete the purchase. These difficulties were overcome, and on June 2, the respondent cabled to Mr. Johnson an acceptance of his final offer. On completion of the sale the respondent received $127 per share.

There is a dispute as to the extent to which McMaster was aware of the progress of the negotiations with Johnsons, but it is clear that he knew of the agreement finally reached by July 5, 1947, when his solicitors wrote to the respondent alleging that on Apr. 8, the date on which the respondent exercised his option, the relationship of solicitor and client subsisted between McMaster and the respondent and that, accordingly, the respondent was accountable to McMaster for the profit he made out of the transaction, i.e., $97,000. Their Lordships think it well to observe that the material date for determining whether a duty of confidence between the respondent and McMaster subsisted is Mar. 22, when the option was granted, and not Apr. 8, when it was exercised. Receiving no satisfaction, on Sept. 15, 1947, McMaster issued the writ in this action.

McMaster died on Nov. 30, 1948, but on Sept. 8, 1949, an order of revivor was made and his executors became the plaintiffs in the action. The action came on for trial before SMILY, J., and on Apr. 27, 1950, he dismissed the action. He held that the respondent was not acting as McMaster's solicitor in the particular transaction in question, but added:

"Nevertheless, while I think that at the time of the transaction in question between the [respondent] and Mr. McMaster it must be said the relationship of solicitor and client in a strict sense had discontinued, I think it must also be said that the confidence naturally arising from such a relationship should be presumed to have continued, as was said by PARKER, J. . . . in Allison v. Clayhills (1). And, as was also said by PARKER, J., in the same case, although the relationship of solicitor and client in its strict sense has been discontinued, the same principle, namely, that the onus of upholding the transaction would rest upon the solicitor, applies as long as the confidence naturally arising from such a relationship is proved or may be presumed to continue."

He found, however, that there had not been a breach of the fiduciary duty owing by the respondent to McMaster and, accordingly, dismissed the action. The plaintiffs appealed from the decision and the Court of Appeal for Ontario dismissed the appeal. LAIDLAW, J. A., who delivered the principal judgment, stated the questions which the court had to determine as follows:

"(1) Was the relationship between the respondent and the late Harry J. McMaster on Mar. 22, 1947, when the respondent obtained from Mr. McMaster an option to purchase his shares of Carleton Securities, Ltd., of such a character as imposed on the respondent a special duty in respect of the transaction ? (2) If there was such a duty on the part of the respondent, was there a breach of it ? ”

The judges of appeal were unanimous in answering the first question in the negative. On this basis it was not necessary to decide the second question, but all three judges expressed their opinion on it. HENDERSON, J. A., and LAIDLAW, J. A., were of opinion that before McMaster gave the option the respondent disclosed without reservation all the information in his possession concerning the possible deal with Johnsons. HOGG, J. A., disagreed. He was of opinion that the facts set out in the respondent's letter of Mar. 27, 1947, to the directors of Sovereign Potters, Ltd. were known to him before his interview with McMaster on Mar. 22, and that these facts, or the most important of them relating to the negotiations with Johnsons, were not known to McMaster and were not placed before him by the respondent before the latter secured the option.

That being the position in the Canadian courts, counsel for the respondent argued before this Board that the decision of the Court of Appeal or the majority of the judges thereof was correct, but he took the preliminary point that there were concurrent findings of fact that, even if the confidence arising from the former relationship of solicitor and client continued, the duty owing to McMaster by the respondent had been fully discharged. If he were right on this point, there would be an end of the matter, but their Lordships are unable to accede to this argument. There is a clear finding in favour of the respondent by the majority in the Court of Appeal, but there is no corresponding finding by SMILY, J., in the court of first instance. He makes no finding of fact as to what was known to the respondent prior to the interview of Mar. 22, 1947, or as to what the respondent told McMaster on that occasion. On the contrary he says:

“ Now as to the [respondent] having disclosed, without reservation, all the information in his possession, this in my opinion means information which might assist or affect Mr. McMaster in deciding whether to enter into the transaction. As I have previously indicated in my opinion there was no such information in the [respondent's] possession at that time. I do not believe any of the information mentioned in the letter of Mar. 27, previously referred to, would have made any difference to Mr. McMaster's desire to sell his stock at the price mentioned.”

and:

“ It seems abundantly clear on all the evidence, and having regard to Mr. McMaster's efforts over the years to get rid of these shares, that there was nothing in the situation then existing which would have caused him to miss this opportunity.”

He seems to have considered that the necessity for disclosure was to be tested by the probable reaction of the particular individual to whom the disclosure should have been made whereas in their Lordships' opinion the proper test is what would be the natural reaction of the reasonable man. Their Lordships may add that it seems particularly undesirable to apply the test adopted by SMILY, J., in a case where the particular individual was dead and could not give evidence before the court. In the result, their Lordships are of opinion that SMILY, J., posed to himself the wrong question and made no findings of fact relevant to the point on which the Court of Appeal based their decision. Their Lordships must, therefore, proceed to consider what is the proper answer to the questions propounded by LAIDLAW, J.A.

On the first question their Lordships find themselves in complete agreement with SMILY, J., that, notwithstanding that the respondent was not acting as solicitor for McMaster in the transaction now in dispute, the confidence arising from the relationship of solicitor and client which had existed between the respondent and McMaster must be taken to have continued to be in existence at the time of the interview between them on Mar. 22, 1947. The Court of Appeal, or at any rate HENDERSON, J.A., and HOGG, J.A., came to the conclusion, no doubt correctly, that the respondent was not acting as solicitor for McMaster on that date. They seem to have been under the belief, but, as the observations of PARKER, J., in Allison v. Clayhills (1) show, under the erroneous belief, that that was the end of the matter. The passages from the judgment of PARKER, J., which were cited by SMILY, J., clearly show that the duty of the solicitor may continue after the relationship of solicitor and client in its strict sense has been discontinued. PARKER, J., goes on to say (97 L.T. 712):

A

B

C

D

E

F

G

H

"In considering whether in any particular transaction any duty exists such as to bring the ordinary rule into operation, all the circumstances of the individual case must be weighed and examined. Thus, a solicitor may by virtue of his employment acquire a personal ascendancy over a client and this ascendancy may last long after the employment has ceased, and the duty towards the client which arises out of any such ascendancy will last as long as the ascendancy itself can operate. Again, a solicitor may by virtue of his employment acquire special knowledge, and the knowledge so obtained may impose upon him the duty of giving advice or making a full and proper disclosure in any transaction between himself and his client, though such transaction may take place long after the relationship of solicitor and client in its stricter sense had ceased to exist. And there may be other circumstances which may impose a duty on a solicitor, which duty may continue to exist after the relationship of solicitor and client in the strict sense has ceased."

It is impossible to define precisely what circumstances will justify the inference that the confidential relationship continues. The more important factors in the present case which have led their Lordships to agree with the conclusion of SMILY, J., on this point are : (i) the fact that McMaster employed the respondent in a number of important business transactions in which McMaster was interested, in particular, (a) the acquisition of Carleton Securities, Ltd., and the transfer to that company of the promoters' holdings in Sovereign Potters, Ltd., (b) the formation of McMaster Potters, Ltd.; (ii) the fact that the respondent was employed by McMaster in the matter of McMaster's will, and was named as one of his executors therein and remained in charge of the will until the parties fell out in July, 1947; (iii) the events of Mar. 22, 1947, when, at the instance of the respondent, McMaster not only granted the option, but signed a document witnessing that Etherington had promised McMaster a portion of the vendor's share in Sovereign Potters, Ltd. Their Lordships must point out that if, as the respondent testified, he came to that interview ready to buy McMaster's holding in Carleton Securities, Ltd., for $30,000, the grant of the option was a transaction solely for the benefit of the respondent and against the interest of McMaster.

As, in their Lordships' view, the respondent was under a duty to McMaster on Mar. 22, 1947, it becomes necessary to consider what the measure of that duty was. It is plain that the respondent did not discharge that duty unless he communicated to McMaster all material facts within his knowledge, a description which their Lordships think would include the facts within his knowledge as to the negotiations between Sovereign Potters, Ltd., and Johnsons. It is also plain that the onus of upholding the transaction lay on the respondent. The majority of the Court of Appeal found that there had been full disclosure, basing themselves on some answers given by the respondent as follows:

"Q.—What was said about it? —A.—Well, there was quite a lot said about it, Mr. Mason. It was on the basis that all I knew at that time was that there had been [negotiations] with Mr. Johnson for a million and a half, and that I had recommended Mason Foulds, and that I was going to go and see him soon. Q.—That is substantially what you knew about it at the time ?—A.—That is substantially what I knew about it at the time.

Q.—Was that or was that not discussed with Mr. McMaster ?—A.—Yes, sir."

A Those answers, said LAIDLAW, J.A., satisfied him that the respondent disclosed without reservation all the information in his possession concerning the deal with Johnsons. Their Lordships feel the same difficulty as did HOGG, J.A., in accepting this view. In the answers on which LAIDLAW, J.A., relies the respondent mentions only two facts in connection with the negotiations with Johnsons. The first is the original asking price of $1,500,000; the second is that he had recommended Mason Foulds & Co. to act as Johnson's solicitors in Canada. This, he says, was substantially what he then knew and was what he told McMaster. Other portions of his evidence tend to show that he knew of the reduced price of $160 per preferred share and $150 per ordinary share by Mar. 22, 1947, and B Pulkingham seems to have told him on Mar. 21 that it looked as though the negotiations might come through. There is nothing to prove that he passed on either of these pieces of information to McMaster. Looking at the evidence as a whole, one is left in doubt whether there was not further material information beyond that referred to in the passage cited by LAIDLAW, J.A., which the C respondent had before Mar. 22, 1947, and which did not reach McMaster.

Counsel for the appellants urged on their Lordships that, if they were left in doubt on this point, the defendant had failed to discharge the onus which rested on him and that judgment should be entered for the appellants for the amount claimed. Their Lordships are unable to accept this contention. The case made by the appellants, relying on this point on Robert McMaster's evidence, was that D nothing had been said on Mar. 22 about negotiations with Johnsons. This is in flat contradiction with the respondent's evidence and their Lordships are not assisted by any finding of the trial judge as to which witness he believed. Moreover, some of the important points mentioned by Pulkingham were not put to the respondent. On the whole, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that justice cannot be done without a fresh trial of the issue whether the respondent E had discharged the onus resting on him by reason of the confidential relationship existing between him and McMaster on Mar. 22, 1947. Since the matter must be re-tried, their Lordships think it better to refrain from further comment on the details of the evidence.

There is one other matter to which their Lordships may usefully refer. It was argued on behalf of the appellants that, if their Lordships were in favour of the F appellants on the first question, the appellants were entitled to succeed as McMaster had had no independent advice. This argument was based on the observation of STIRLING, L.J. ([1903] 1 Ch. 60) in Wright v. Carter (2) that "secondly, he must have competent independent advice." Their Lordships respectfully agree with the comment of PARKER, J., on that dictum in Allison v. Clayhills (1) where he says (97 L.T. 712):

G " . . . I doubt whether the learned lord justice really meant to lay this down as an invariable rule whatever might be the nature of the transaction in dispute, for, if this were an invariable rule in all transactions, it is difficult to see how either Edwards v. Meyrick (3) or Montesquieu v. Sandys (4) were rightly decided."

H The question whether the facts of this case make independent advice indispensable is a matter for the judge who tries the issue. When all the facts have been ascertained the trial judge may, or he may not, consider that the question what was the proper price to ask for the shares was one which McMaster as a business man could well determine for himself if fully informed as to the facts.

Their Lordships have given consideration to the question of costs. The necessity for the new trial is due largely to the course which the proceedings took in the courts in Canada. For this both sides must bear their share of responsibility and their Lordships think that justice will be done if each party has to bear his own costs of those proceedings. Before this Board the appellants have succeeded on one issue, but it will avail them nothing unless they succeed on the other issue in the new trial. Their Lordships think, therefore, that the respondent should pay only one half of the appellants' costs of appeal to this Board.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be allowed and the judgments in the Canadian courts set aside, that it be declared that on Mar. 22, 1947, the respondent, by reason of the relationship of solicitor and client formerly subsisting between him and the late Harry J. McMaster, owed a duty to the late Harry J. McMaster in relation to the acquisition of the option granted to the respondent by the said Harry J. McMaster on the date aforesaid, and that the matter be remitted to the Supreme Court of Ontario for a new trial of the other issues outstanding between the appellants and the respondent in the action commenced by writ dated Sept. 15, 1947. The appellants and respondent must respectively bear their own costs to this date of the proceedings in the courts in Canada other than the costs made costs in the appeal to this Board by the order dated Jan. 12, 1951. The respondent must pay to the appellants half the appellants' costs of the appeal to this Board.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Blake & Redden (for the appellants); Charles Russell & Co. (for the respondent).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES TRIBUNAL AND ANOTHER. Ex parte PRACTICAL BANKING, LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.), May 15, 1952.]

Master and Servant—Trade dispute—Recognised terms and conditions of employment—Observance by employer not member of negotiating trade organisation—Industrial Disputes Order, 1951 (S.I., 1951, No. 1376), art. 2.

The proprietors of a newspaper employed as editor a member of the National Union of Journalists. On being asked by the union to pay to members of the union employed by them the rate of wages agreed between the Newspaper Society and the union, the newspaper proprietors replied that they were not members of the society. On Aug. 21, 1951, the union reported to the Minister of Labour and National Service an issue under art. 2 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, viz., whether the newspaper proprietors should observe the terms and conditions of employment for journalists negotiated between the union and the society, and on Nov. 19, 1951, acting under art. 9 (1) of the order of 1951, the Minister referred the issue to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal. On a motion for prohibition to prohibit the tribunal from proceeding on the reference,

HELD: the object of art. 2 of the order of 1951 was to enable terms which had been negotiated between representatives of a substantial proportion of employers and workmen in a trade, or section of a trade, to apply to the trade as a whole and to be imposed on employers and workmen who were not members of the negotiating bodies; the sole question referred by the Minister to the tribunal being whether the newspaper proprietors should observe the terms and conditions of employment for journalists which had been negotiated by the union and the society, the reference fell within the provisions of art. 2; although the question of the editor's wages might come into the matter incidentally, the reference was not in regard to the wages of a single workman; and, therefore, there was no ground for prohibiting the tribunal from proceeding with it.

R. v. National Arbitration Tribunal. Ex p. South Shields Corpn. ([1951] 2 All E.R. 828), distinguished.

FOR THE INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES ORDER, 1951, see BUTTERWORTH'S COMMERCIAL CONTROLS, Service, Title Employment [8], p. 1.

A Case referred to:

(1) R. v. National Arbitration Tribunal. Ex p. South Shields Corpn., [1951] 2 All E.R. 828; [1952] 1 K.B. 46; 115 J.P. 594.

MOTION for prohibition.

B The applicants, Practical Banking, Ltd., were the proprietors of a newspaper and employed as editor a member of the National Union of Journalists. On receiving a letter from the union asking them to pay to members of the union employed by them the rate of wages agreed by the Newspaper Society and the union, the applicants replied that they were not members of the society. On Aug. 21, 1951, the union reported to the Minister of Labour and National Service an issue under art. 2 of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, viz., whether the applicants should observe the terms and conditions of employment for journalists negotiated between the union and the society, and the Minister referred the issue to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal under art. 9 (1) of the order. The applicants sought to prohibit the tribunal and the union from proceeding in the issue.

D. L. Renton for the applicants.

D S. B. R. Cooke for the Industrial Disputes Tribunal.

H. P. Stirling for the National Union of Journalists.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicants, Practical Banking, Ltd., moves for an order prohibiting the Industrial Disputes Tribunal from entertaining a reference by the Minister of Labour and National Service, made on Nov. 19, 1951, of the question:

E “Whether Practical Banking, Ltd. . . . proprietors of the ‘Muswell Hill Record’, should observe the terms and conditions of employment for journalists employed by weekly newspapers within twelve miles radius of Charing Cross negotiated between [the National Union of Journalists] and the Newspaper Society.”

F The matter turns on the construction of the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, and it is contended by the applicants that it is concluded in their favour by the decision of this court in R. v. National Arbitration Tribunal. Ex p. South Shields Corpn. (1). In my opinion, however, that case has no application to the present reference.

G The Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, was made under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (as amended by S.R. & O., 1940, No. 1217), reg. 58AA (1), which gives the Minister of Labour power to make provision, by order

“(c) for requiring employers to observe such terms and conditions of employment as may be determined in accordance with the order to be, or to be not less favourable than, the recognised terms and conditions.”

H Part I of the order of 1951 is headed “Reporting of disputes and issues”, art. 1 deals with the reporting of a trade dispute, and art. 2 deals with “Reporting of issues concerning recognised terms and conditions of employment.”

By art. 12 (1) (the interpretation article):

“‘issue’ has the meaning assigned to it in art. 2 of this order.”

That is not a happy way of defining the word “issue”, because, although art. 2 (b) states what is to be referred to as "an issue", the article contains no actual definition of "issue".

The matter arose in the following way. The applicants employed as editor of their newspaper, "Muswell Hill Record", one Miss Finnemore, who is a member of the National Union of Journalists. On July 10, 1951, the organiser of the union wrote to the editor of "Muswell Hill Record" saying:

"I am informed that my members employed in your office have not been paid the increased rate of wages and cost of living bonus agreed between this union and the Newspaper Society. It occurs to me that there might be some misunderstanding, and I shall be obliged if you will take steps to have the necessary adjustments made."

On July 13 the applicants' general manager replied:

"Thank you for your letter of July 10 and for its courteous tone. There does seem to be some misunderstanding, for the 'Muswell Hill Record' is not a member of the Newspaper Society."

That correspondence seems to me to raise at once an issue under art. 2 of the order of 1951, as I think that the inference to be drawn from those letters is that, while the union say that the applicants must abide by the terms and conditions of employment which have been negotiated between them and the Newspaper Society, the applicants say that they are not going to recognise the rates of wages which prevail by reason of any agreement between the two organisations, as they are not members of the Newspaper Society.

Regulation 58AA (1) (c) does not deal with employers who are members of organisations, but it empowers the Minister to make provision by order

"for requiring employers to observe such terms and conditions of employment as may be determined in accordance with the order to be, or to be not less favourable than, the recognised terms and conditions."

In other words, if an employer is employing people on terms other than those to which the regulation refers as "the recognised terms and conditions", the regulation applies. Article 2 of the order of 1951 provides:

"Where—(a) in any trade or industry or section of trade or industry in any district terms and conditions of employment are established which have been settled by machinery of negotiation or arbitration to which the parties are organisations of employers and trade unions representative respectively of substantial proportions of the employers and workers engaged in that trade or industry or section of trade or industry in that district (hereinafter referred to as 'recognised terms and conditions'); and (b) an issue as to whether an employer in that district should observe the recognised terms and conditions (hereinafter referred to as 'an issue') is reported to the Minister in accordance with this order by an organisation of employers or a trade union; and (c) the Minister is of opinion that the organisation of employers or trade union reporting the issue habitually takes part in the settlement of terms and conditions of employment in the trade or industry or section of trade or industry concerned; that issue shall be dealt with in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this order."

The object of that article, as it seems to me, is to enable the terms which have been negotiated between representatives of a substantial proportion of employers and workmen to be imposed on other employers and workmen, whether they are members of the negotiating bodies or not. Presumably, employers and workmen who were members of negotiating bodies would agree to abide by the terms that had been agreed between the parties. Article 2 of the order of 1951, obviously is intended to provide for the case where workmen are being employed on conditions of employment which are different from those negotiated, it being intended that the negotiated terms should apply to the trade as a whole.

Counsel for the applicants attempted to apply the decision of this court in the South Shields case (1) to the case now before us, but, in effect, the South Shields case (1) is quite different. In the first place, it was sought to refer the South Shields case (1) as a trade dispute and not as an issue concerning recognised terms and conditions of employment under art. 2 of the order of 1951. In the South Shields case (1) a joint committee set up by the Association of Municipal Corporations and the Society of Town Clerks made recommendations in regard to the conditions of service and the scale of salaries applicable to town clerks. The South Shields Corporation refused to adopt the recommendations as they considered that their town clerk was already being paid an adequate salary. The society, on behalf of the town clerk, reported to the Minister of Labour and National Service that a trade dispute had arisen as to the town clerk's conditions of service and salary and the Minister referred the dispute to the National Arbitration Tribunal under the Conditions of Employment and National Arbitration Order, 1940, art. 2. Before the dispute was heard by the tribunal, the order of 1940 was revoked by the Industrial Disputes Order, 1951, art. 13 (1). By art. 13 (2) and sched. II, para. 1 (b) (ii), of the order of 1951, it was provided that the new order should apply to any pending cases. But for that fact, our decision in the South Shields case (1) would have been different from what it was. Our decision in that case was that a dispute between an employer and one workman in regard to the wage to be paid to that workman could not be referred to the Industrial Disputes Tribunal, as the order of 1951 was intended to deal with disputes which affected all the workmen in the service of an employer or a section of workmen in his employment, and the tribunal had no jurisdiction to deal with an individual case.

In the case now before us, although the matter may have arisen as a result of the allegation by the National Union of Journalists that the editor of the applicants' newspaper was being paid less than the recognised rate of wages, the reference is not with regard to her wages, although the question of her wages may come into the matter incidentally. The sole question for the Industrial Disputes Tribunal is whether the applicants should observe the terms and conditions of employment which have been agreed between the Newspaper Society and the National Union of Journalists. For these reasons it seems to me that the reference by the Minister falls exactly within the provisions of art. 2 of the order of 1951, and, consequently, there is no ground for prohibiting the tribunal from proceeding with the reference.

JONES, J.: I agree.

PARKER, J.: I also agree.

Application refused.

Solicitors: Slaughter & May (for the applicants); Solicitor, Ministry of Labour and National Service (for the tribunal); Vizard, Oldham, Crowder & Cash (for the respondent union).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

THACKRAY v. CENTRAL LAND BOARD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), May 7, 1952.]

Town and Country Planning—Permission for development—Consent in agreement made under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 34 (1)—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 12 (1).

In 1933 a town planning scheme prepared by a borough council, as local planning authority, was approved. On July 24, 1937, pursuant to para. 40 of the scheme, which provided that the planning authority might enter into agreements for the purpose of carrying the scheme into effect, the borough council entered into an agreement with T., expressed to be made under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 34 (1), by which agreement the borough council consented to the erection on certain land of fourteen buildings each consisting of a shop on the ground floor with two self-contained residential flats above. T. agreed that the said land should be permanently subject to the conditions restricting the planning development and use thereof contained in the schedule to the said agreement. After the appointed day (July 1, 1948) under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (by which the Act of 1932 was repealed and the county council was substituted for the borough council as planning authority), T. desired to proceed with the erection of the buildings, and, the consent contained in the agreement of 1937 not having been revoked, he claimed that planning permission under the Act of 1947 was not required, with the result that no development charge was exigible.

HELD: notwithstanding that the agreement remained effective and enforceable against the county council by virtue of para. 10 of sched. X to the Act of 1947 and reg. 10 of the Town and Country Planning (Transfer of Property and Officers and Compensation to Officers) Regulations, 1948, made under s. 101 of the Act, and notwithstanding the provisions of s. 38 (2) of the Interpretation Act, 1889, relating to the preservation of rights acquired under a repealed enactment, the consent did not constitute the permission under Part III of the Act of 1947 which was made requisite by s. 12 (1) of that Act, and, therefore, it was necessary for T. to obtain permission under s. 12.

FOR THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1947, s. 12, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 25, pp. 506-509.

Cases referred to:

- (1) London County Council v. Allen, [1914] 3 K.B. 642; 83 L.J.K.B. 1695; 111 L.T. 610; 78 J.P. 449; 40 Digest 302, 2602.
- (2) Ransom & Luck, Ltd. v. Surbiton Borough Council, [1949] 1 All E.R. 185; [1949] Ch. 180; [1949] L.J.R. 809; 113 J.P. 95; 2nd Digest Supp.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine (i) whether on the construction of (a) an agreement in writing made on July 24, 1937, between the plaintiff, of the one part, and the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of Ealing (the planning authority), of the other part, and (b) the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 12 (1), and sched. X, para. 10, the plaintiff was entitled to carry out the operations and changes of use specified in para. 1 of the said agreement without any permission under the said Act; and (ii) whether the plaintiff was entitled to carry out the operations and changes of use specified in para. 1 of the said agreement without being required to pay to the defendants under Part VII of the said Act any development charge in respect of such operations or changes of use.

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and R. H. Bernstein for the plaintiff, the landowner.
Denys B. Buckley for the defendants, the Central Land Board.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This application raises two questions under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. They are: (i) whether permission was required for certain development which the plaintiff wished to carry out under that Act, and (ii) whether a development charge was payable under the provisions of the Act in question. The second question depends on the answer to the first. That appears from the provisions of s. 69 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, which provides:

A " (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall be paid to the Central Land Board in respect of the carrying out of any operations to which this Part of this Act applies, and in respect of any use of land to which this Part of this Act applies, a development charge of such amount (if any) as the board may determine . . . (2) This Part of this Act applies to all operations for the carrying out of which planning permission under Part III of this Act is required, and to all users of land for the institution or continuance of which such permission is so required."

B So it is plain that, if permission is required under the provisions of the Act, the exaction of a development charge must follow. The Ealing Borough Council were the planning authority for the relevant area under the Town Planning Act, 1925, and the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, but under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, the Middlesex County Council have been substituted for the borough council.

C Under the Town Planning Act, 1925, s. 1 and s. 2, power was conferred on the borough council to make town planning schemes, and those provisions were continued by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 54. On Mar. 28, 1933, a scheme prepared by the borough council was approved by the Minister. In para. 28 of that scheme there are provisions as to the character of the buildings which were to be erected, and para. 40 of the scheme provides that the local authority may enter into agreements for the purpose of carrying the scheme into effect. On July 24, 1937, such an agreement was entered into between the borough council and the plaintiff, Mr. James Deighton Thackray, and that agreement is expressed in the recital to have been made pursuant to the Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 34, and all other powers them enabling. The Town and Country Planning Act, 1932, s. 34 (1), enables local authorities to enter into agreements with landowners to impose restrictions on the land held by the latter, and it further enables local authorities to enforce such agreements in a way which was not previously possible because of the decisions relating to restrictive covenants—in particular, London County Council v. Allen (1)—that to enforce a covenant against other than the covenantor a covenantee must be interested in neighbouring land to which the benefit of the covenants could be attached. Section 34 (1) has been said by the Court of Appeal in Ransom & Luck, Ltd. v. Surbiton Borough Council (2) to be strictly limited, and it was held in that case that the section could not prevent a planning authority exercising such powers of revocation as they had under the Town and Country Planning (Interim Development) Act, 1943.

D The agreement in the present case provides by cl. 1:

" Subject to the terms hereinafter mentioned the council hereby consent to the erection of fourteen buildings each consisting of a shop on the ground floor with two self-contained residential flats over on the said land (other than [an open space.])"

E Clause 2 provided that the owner, i.e., the plaintiff, was to submit plans for the approval of the council when he came to carry out his erection of the buildings. By cl. 4 the plaintiff agreed that:

" the said land shall be permanently subject to the conditions restricting the planning development and use thereof contained in the schedule hereto and that such restrictions shall be enforceable by the council against the owner and persons deriving title under him in like manner and to the like extent."

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that that consent to the erection of the buildings is still effective, and, therefore, he, now desiring to proceed with the erection of the buildings, is not liable to obtain any permission under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (although it appears to be the fact that such permission has been obtained), and, therefore, it follows that no development charge is payable by him in the circumstances. It is not contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the Ealing Borough Council, or, it must follow, I think, the Middlesex County Council, are prevented from revoking the permission or consent which is contained in that agreement, but it is pointed out that such permission or consent has not been revoked, and, therefore, it is said that it is still effective having regard to the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947.

I have referred to s. 69 of the Act of 1947 which imposes a development charge, except in the case which is mentioned in s. 80, i.e., land which is ripe for development and with regard to which there has been a building contract entered into (which cannot apply in the present case). Section 12 of the Act is most important. It provides, under sub-s. (1):

"Subject to the provisions of this section and to the following provisions of this Act, permission shall be required under this Part of this Act in respect of any development of land which is carried out after the appointed day."

The appointed day was July 1, 1948, and, therefore, in the present case, the development which it is desired to carry out will be work "which is carried out after the appointed day." Sub-section (2) provides:

"In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires, the expression 'development' means the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land."

There is no doubt that the erection of the buildings by the plaintiff will be a "development" within the meaning of that provision.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to s. 12 (5), s. 77 (1), and s. 78 (1) and continued:] Those provisions cannot apply to the present case, and the point of the reference to them is to show, as contended by counsel for the Central Land Board, that, where it is desired to preserve the effect of permissions previously given, the Act provides in appropriate terms that permission under the Act shall be deemed to have been given in those cases.

Section 101 (1) contains provisions under which the Minister may make regulations

"(a) for the transfer to local planning authorities of property and liabilities of councils of county districts, being property and liabilities held or incurred for the purposes of the exercise, under the enactments relating to town and country planning in force before the appointed day, of functions corresponding with the functions of local planning authorities under this Act; (b) for the transfer to local planning authorities, or to the constituent authorities of joint planning committees, of property and liabilities of such committees . . ."

Then the transfer of officers and the continuation of proceedings are dealt with.

In pursuance of s. 101 the Minister has made the Town and Country Planning (Transfer of Property and Officers and Compensation to Officers) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1236). Regulation 3 of those regulations provides:

"Save as is mentioned in reg. 5 of these regulations, the property and liabilities of the council of a county district being property and liabilities held or incurred for the purpose of old planning functions shall on the appointed day be transferred to and vest in the local planning authority for the area in which such district is situated."

Regulation 10 provides that:

" All contracts, deeds, agreements, notices and other instruments affecting any old planning functions or any property or liabilities transferred by virtue of these regulations and subsisting at the appointed day shall be of as full force and effect against or in favour of the local planning authority or authorities to whom the transfer was made and may be enforced as fully and effectually as if, instead of the council or joint planning committee named in the instrument, the authority or authorities to whom the transfer was made had been a party thereto."

That regulation does not seem to be authorised under the particular powers conferred in paragraphs (a) to (f) of s. 101 (1), but I think it is justified under the general authority in the sub-section to make regulations consequential on or supplementary to the provisions of s. 4, and the effect appears to be that I must treat the agreement of July 24, 1937, as though the Middlesex County Council were a party to it instead of the Ealing Borough Council.

The Act of 1932 has been repealed by virtue of s. 113 (2) of, and sched. IX to, the Act of 1947. In sched. X, which is entitled: "Transitory Provisions and Provisions Consequential on Repeals" I find the following provisions in para. 10:

" Subject as hereinafter provided, any agreement for restricting the planning, development or use of land made under s. 34 of the Act of 1932 with any such authority as is mentioned in sub-s. (2) of that section, or made or having effect as if made under a planning scheme with the responsible authority for the purposes of the scheme, shall, if in force on the appointed day, continue in force in accordance with the terms thereof and may be enforced under the said s. 34 or under the scheme, as the case may be."

It appears to me that the principal object of that transitional provision is to enable the restrictive provisions contained in an agreement made with a former planning authority to be enforced by the new and substituted planning authority against any landowner who has submitted to the imposition of restrictive covenants on his land. It would appear that s. 34 (1) of the Act of 1932, as construed by the Court of Appeal in Ransom & Luck, Ltd. v. Surbiton Borough Council (2), had a very limited effect and was really concerned with the making effective of an agreement for restrictive covenants, but there is, of course, the provision that, if it has effect under a planning scheme, it will be enforceable under the scheme. Therefore, there is to that extent a wider provision in para. 10 of sched. X to the Act of 1947 than simply the continuing in force of the terms of s. 34.

Consequently, it seems that the agreement in the present case remains in force and is enforceable by virtue of the provisions of this paragraph. There are certain provisos which also appear in the paragraph. Provisos (b) and (c) are concerned with the modification of any restrictive provisions for the development or use of the land either by the Minister or on the application of a party or by arbitration. Proviso (a) is certainly in wider terms. It provides that:

" nothing in any such agreement shall be construed as restricting the exercise, in relation to land to which any such agreement applies, of any powers exercisable by any Minister or authority under this Act so long as those powers are exercised in accordance with the provisions of the development plan or in accordance with any directions which may have been given by the Minister under s. 36 of this Act, or as requiring the exercise of any such powers otherwise than as aforesaid."

Counsel for the Central Land Board has said that that is simply a recognition of the principle which was stated by the Court of Appeal in Ransom & Luck, Ltd.

v. Surbiton Borough Council (2). However that may be, this provision is, undoubtedly, wider than merely the consideration of restrictions on the use of land contained in an agreement by a landowner. Furthermore, I find that under the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 38 (2):

“Where this Act or any Act passed after the commencement of this Act repeals any other enactment, then, unless the contrary intention appears, the repeal shall not . . . (c) affect any right, privilege, obligation, or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under any enactment so repealed.”

The Act of 1932 has been repealed by the Act of 1947, and it is said, with some force, that the right given by the consent of the Ealing Borough Council under the agreement of July 24, 1937, made under s. 34 (1) of the Act of 1932, is a right which has been acquired by the plaintiff under the provisions of the repealed enactment. Therefore, it is said that the repeal of the Act of 1932 ought not to affect the right which the plaintiff acquired by virtue of the consent. All that is true, but it seems to me that it is not sufficient for the plaintiff's purposes.

It would have been extremely simple for the legislature to have provided in the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, that any consent or permission given by a planning authority under the Acts which previously existed should remain effective so that permission under the Act of 1947 should not be required. The legislature has not done that, and, furthermore, the legislature has provided in certain cases where permission has been given that permission should be deemed to have been given under the Act of 1947. That seems to me to be of importance, as indicating the manner in which I should approach the question which I have to decide. Although I must treat any right as given by the agreement of July 24, 1937, as not affected by the repeal of the Act under which it was given, and although I must treat the agreement as being an effective agreement, enforceable according to the provisions of para. 10 of sched. X to the Act of 1947, and, by virtue of s. 101 and the regulations made thereunder, as an agreement which was entered into by the Middlesex County Council, the present planning authority, yet all that does not make the consent contained in the agreement more than a consent which was given under the provisions of the Act of 1932 and does not amount to a permission of the necessary nature, i.e., a permission given under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. Accordingly, I am driven to the conclusion, however arbitrary the result may be, that in this case permission was required under the provisions of s. 12 of the Act of 1947 for the development desired by the plaintiff, there being no effective provision which excepts him from the express terms of s. 12. Such permission being necessary, it follows from s. 69 of the Act of 1947 that the development charge will be payable.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Lamartine Yates & Lacey, agents for Francis & Davies, Sudbury, Middlesex (for the plaintiff) ; Treasury Solicitor (for the defendants).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re GALLOWAY (deceased). HOLLINS AND OTHERS v.
ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY OF THE COUNTY PALATINE OF LANCASTER (Sir Leonard Stone, V.-C.), March 12, April 22, 1952.]

A

National Health Service—Hospital—Transfer of property and endowment—“Held by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital”—Trustees having liberty to pay or apply income of fund to or for a hospital until further order of court—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 7 (4) (10).

B

By his will dated Apr. 12, 1933, the testator gave his residuary estate “Upon trust for such one or more charitable institutions objects or purposes established at the time of my death or to be established within twenty-one years after my death by my trustees or other persons in or within five miles from Preston aforesaid for the furtherance of or in connection with the maintenance or benefit of poor people residing in or in the neighbourhood of Preston aforesaid in such shares if more than one upon such terms and conditions in such manner in every respect as my trustees in their absolute discretion shall direct with power for them in that behalf to make or approve any settlements or dealings and to transfer any property to any person or corporation.” In 1938 proceedings were commenced by the trustees asking for the directions of the court regarding the execution of these trusts. By an order dated Apr. 4, 1938, the trustees were given liberty to set aside a sum of £20,000 and to invest the same in their own names and until further order “from time to time to pay or apply the whole or such part (if any) as they shall think fit of the income of such investments for the maintenance of the ” Preston and County of Lancaster Queen Victoria Royal Infirmary. After further directions, the order recited that the trustees desired to retain the wide powers and discretions conferred on them by the will. Until July 2, 1948, the trustees applied the income of the investments representing the £20,000 (hereinafter called “the trust fund”) for the maintenance of the infirmary. The Minister of Health claimed that on July 5, 1948 (the “appointed day” under the National Health Service Act, 1946), the trust fund was transferred to and vested in him by virtue of s. 7 (4) of the Act of 1946.

D

E

F

G

HELD: the trust fund was not held by the trustees solely for the purposes of the infirmary within s. 7 (10) of the Act of 1946, but was held by them on trust to pay the income only to the infirmary for a limited period, subject (i) to the exercise of the trustees’ discretion so to pay, and (ii) to the absence of a further order of the court giving directions to apply the income to other charitable purposes, and, therefore, the trust fund was not an “endowment” within s. 7 (4) of the Act and did not vest in the Minister on the appointed day.

Re Marjoribanks’ Indenture ([1952] 1 All E.R. 191), applied.

FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ACT, 1946, s. 7 (4), see HALSBURY’S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, p. 342.

H

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Marjoribanks’ Indenture, [1952] 1 All E.R. 191; [1952] Ch. 181.
- (2) Minister of Health v. Fox, [1950] 1 All E.R. 1050; [1950] Ch. 369; 2nd Digest Supp.

PETITION to determine whether the trustees of the will of William Wilding Galloway, deceased, (a) ought to transfer to the Minister of Health a trust fund constituted under the said will and the income arising therefrom since July 5, 1948, or (b) ought to apply the trust fund and the income arising therefrom since July 5, 1948, for the benefit of poor persons residing in or in the neighbourhood of Preston, Lancashire.

E. W. Griffith for the plaintiffs (trustees of the will).

Gray, Q.C., and H. C. Easton for the Minister of Health.

Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster and Queen's Attorney and Serjeant within the County Palatine of Lancaster (Milner Holland, Q.C.) and P. I. Bell. A

Cur. adv. vult.

April 22. SIR LEONARD STONE, V.-C., read the following judgment. This petition raises a question regarding the effect of the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 7, on £20,000, part of the residuary estate disposed of in favour of charity by the will, dated Apr. 12, 1933, to which there is a codicil dated Aug. 16, 1934, of William Wilding Galloway who died on Sept. 27, 1936. B

By cl. 17 of his will the testator gave his residuary estate, which amounted to upwards of £150,000, to his trustees

"Upon trust for such one or more charitable institutions objects or purposes established at the time of my death or to be established within twenty-one years after my death by my trustees or other persons in or within five miles from Preston aforesaid for the furtherance of or in connection with the maintenance or benefit of poor people residing in or in the neighbourhood of Preston aforesaid in such shares if more than one upon such terms and conditions in such manner in every respect as my trustees in their absolute discretion shall direct with power for them in that behalf to make or approve any settlements or dealings and to transfer any property to any person or corporation." C D

These proceedings were commenced in 1938 by the trustees of the testator's estate to obtain the assistance of this court in regard to the execution of these charitable trusts of residue, and to these proceedings Mr. Davies and Mr. Matthew, the honorary treasurers of the Preston and County of Lancaster Queen Victoria Royal Infirmary, were made defendants. On Apr. 4, 1938, the court made an order which must have a most material bearing on the question which I have to determine. The first operative part of that order is an undertaking by Mr. Davies and Mr. Matthew to apply the sum of £20,000 thereafter mentioned in or towards the erection and equipment of a new wing of the said Preston and County of Lancaster Queen Victoria Royal Infirmary to be used for the reception of poor persons requiring orthopaedic and other treatment and that the name of "Galloway" should be used in perpetuity in connection with such new wing. This is implemented by an order that the trustees be at liberty to pay to Mr. Davies and Mr. Matthew £20,000 out of the residuary estate. No question arises on that £20,000. It has, presumably, long ago been paid over and used in accordance with the undertaking, and, if this is so, the wing of the infirmary built and equipped with it vested on July 5, 1948, in the Ministry of Health under the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6. E F G

Then comes the part of the order relevant to the question I have to determine. It is:

"that the plaintiffs be at liberty to set aside out of the residuary estate of the testator a further sum of £20,000 and to invest the same in their own names and that the plaintiffs be at liberty until further order from time to time to pay or apply the whole or such part (if any) as they shall think fit of the income of such investments for the maintenance of the said infirmary." H

I will call the £20,000 here referred to "the second £20,000 fund." The order proceeds to deal with sums of £2,000 and £5,000, parts of the testator's residuary estate which, on certain other defendants (who represented two other charities) executing respectively trust deeds as set out in schedules to the order, the trustees were to be at liberty to pay over to them. The order continues:

A "And the plaintiffs by their counsel declaring that it is their desire to retain the wide powers and discretions conferred upon them by the will of the testator in the administration and application of the funds subject to the trusts of his will . . ."

B There follow particulars of a sum of £10,000 mentioned in cl. 15 (a) of the testator's will and another sum of £10,000 part of the residuary estate of the testator proposed to be applied in the purchase, equipment and maintenance of playgrounds for the benefit of poor persons living in or in the neighbourhood of Preston. The order continues:

"And it is ordered that the plaintiffs be at liberty from time to time as they may be advised to bring into chambers schemes for the application of any other funds subject to the trusts of the will of the testator to be considered by the registrar and (if he shall think fit) settled by him."

C Lastly, after an order regarding costs:

"And it is ordered that the further hearing and further consideration of this petition be adjourned."

D The evidence is silent regarding schemes for other parts of the testator's residuary estate, and, no doubt, nothing turns on them. From April, 1938, until July 2, 1948, the plaintiffs as trustees applied the income from time to time of the second £20,000 fund to the use of the infirmary. In fact, they apportioned the income down to July 5, 1948, being the appointed day on which the vesting of voluntary hospitals in the Minister of Health under the National Health Service Act, 1946, took effect. On July 2, 1948, the plaintiff, Sir William Ascroft, on behalf of the testator's trustees, wrote the following letter to Mr. John Gibson who was at that time superintendent and secretary of the infirmary:

E "As the State takes over the Preston Royal Infirmary on the fifth instant, we enclose cheque for £173 14s. being the apportioned interest which the trustees were authorised to pay on £19,323 13s. 5d. 3½ per cent. Conversion stock in which the sum of £20,000 was invested, until further order of the court. The trustees have been advised by counsel that they have no power to pay over further income after the appointed day, so that this will, of necessity, be the last payment."

F Thereafter the Minister of Health demanded the transfer to himself of the second £20,000 fund, and it is whether that demand is well founded that I have to determine.

G By the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 6 (1), it is provided:

H "Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital or used for the purposes of a voluntary hospital, and in equipment, furniture or other movable property used in or in connection with such premises, being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, and all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof, but not including any endowment within the meaning of the next following section or any rights or liabilities transferred under that section."

The words in that sub-section to which attention must be drawn are "being interests held immediately before the appointed day . . . by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital."

Sub-section (2) transfers all hospitals vested in local authorities immediately before the appointed day, and again it is property "held . . . solely for the purposes of those hospitals" which is to be transferred to and vested in the Ministry.

Section 6 having only embraced interests in or attached to land and any equipment, furniture, or other movable property, s. 7 deals with the endowments of any voluntary hospital. The first three sub-sections of that section deal with the endowments of hospitals designated as teaching hospitals. The Preston and County of Lancaster Queen Victoria Royal Infirmary is not a teaching hospital, and, therefore, it is sub-s. (4) which is applicable to the endowments (if any) of that infirmary. That sub-section provides that all endowments of voluntary hospitals to which the last foregoing section applies, other than a hospital to which the foregoing provisions of that section apply,

"being endowments held immediately before the appointed day, shall on that day be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act free of any trust existing immediately before that day; and the Minister shall establish a fund, to be called the Hospital Endowments Fund, to which he shall transfer all such endowments."

By sub-s. (10) an endowment is defined as follows:

"In this section the expression 'endowment,' in relation to a voluntary hospital, means property held by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, being property of the following descriptions . . . (b) shares, stocks, bonds, debentures and other securities, and any other personal property held by way of an investment."

Again the expression "property held . . . by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital" is used.

In this case there is no mention at all of the infirmary in the will of the testator and whether or not the second £20,000 fund was immediately before the appointed day held solely for the purposes of the infirmary must depend on the effect of the order of Apr. 4, 1938, and events which have since occurred. Let me say at once that the Attorney-General, who argued the case on behalf of charity generally, did not seek to make any point or place any reliance on Sir William Ascroft's letter of July 2, 1948, or on the attitude of the trustees in refusing to make further payments after the cheque for £173 14s. sent with that letter. Looking at the order of Apr. 4, 1938, as a whole, there is a marked distinction between, on the one hand, the first £20,000 fund, which was to be used to build and equip the new wing and with regard to which the honorary treasurers gave their undertaking, and the sums of £2,000 and £5,000 with regard to which the representatives of other charities were to execute trust deeds, and, on the other hand, the second sum of £20,000 which was to be invested in the names of the plaintiffs as trustees and in regard to the income of which, but not the capital, the testator's trustees were to "be at liberty until further order from time to time to pay or apply the whole or such part (if any) as they shall think fit . . . for the maintenance of the . . . infirmary."

Unlike what happened in the case of the first £20,000 fund, the £2,000, and the £5,000, the trustees have not given up once and for all, or surrendered to the court, the discretions conferred on them by cl. 17 of the testator's will with regard to that slice of the testator's residuary estate.

But, even so, was the second £20,000 fund held by them immediately before the appointed day solely for the purposes of the infirmary? I am fortunate in having the authoritative guidance on this subject of the Court of Appeal in Re Marjoribanks' Indenture (1). True it is that the decision of the Court of Appeal was in regard to land so that s. 6 of the Act was material in that case. That makes, in my view, no difference, because, not only are the material words "held . . . solely for the purposes of that hospital" the same in s. 6 as in s. 7, but in Re Marjoribanks' Indenture (1) the Court of Appeal considered an earlier decision of WYNN-PARRY, J., in Minister of Health v. Fox (2) where WYNN-PARRY, J., had to deal with an endowment fund as well as with land. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., delivered the judgment of the court in Re Marjoribanks' Indenture (1), and said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 196):

"The arguments have presented us with a choice between two extreme views. And each has itself—quite properly—been subjected to the test of extreme cases with a view to showing that each, in such cases, tends to unreality or absurdity. Thus it is, in our judgment, the most formidable of the criticisms directed to the view of WYNN-PARRY, J., as expressed in Minister of Health v. Fox (2), that in a case in which land is held on trusts for the purposes of a hospital for some limited period and thereafter for some other public or private purposes, the effect of the Act would be to destroy those later interests, which, in the case of private interests, would be equivalent to an expropriation for which no kind of compensation is provided. Moreover, as it seems to us, the view taken in Minister of Health v. Fox (2), by WYNN-PARRY, J., appears to treat the word 'held' as equivalent to 'used in fact.' . . . On the other hand, the plaintiff's argument appears to have (at least) the effect of excluding from the Act altogether every case of hospital land held under the terms of a trust deed which contains any provision directed to the application of the trust property to some other purpose in the possible event of the discontinuance for any reason of the specified 'hospital' trust, and, unless, in looking for the existence of such possibilities, it is illegitimate to look outside the express provisions of the relevant trust instrument—notwithstanding the absence of any language in s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1946 requiring such a confinement of the search—the exempting effect of the phrase under discussion might well, under the doctrine of resulting trust, extend to a large proportion of the land held on July 4, 1948, on trust for the purposes of voluntary hospitals. Neither of the extreme views, when so examined and tested, appears readily to conform to the intention naturally attributable to Parliament. But, in our judgment, it is unnecessary for the court to choose between the two alternatives presented. The relevant words require, as we think, in each case the simple question to be asked and answered in reference to July 4, 1948: 'On that day, for what purposes did the trustees hold the land?' In the present case the proper answer would have been: 'For the purposes of the Royal Midland Counties Home for Incurables and no other.' In our judgment that answer would be plainly in conformity with common sense. Nor can we think that its faithfulness would in any sense be qualified by the presence of the remote remainder in favour of other charitable purposes determined by the committee and subscribers on the contingency of the home ceasing to continue or by the provision enabling income of the invested proceeds of sale to be applied in payment of pensions, for, in our view, the payment of such pensions, though distinct from the activities of the home as a physical entity, is nevertheless fairly to be regarded as a purpose of the home, whether regarded from its material or institutional aspect. It is a purpose so closely connected with, and so much a part of, the purposes of the home as such that it must, in our judgment, necessarily cease if for any reason the home itself ceased to exist."

Applying that test to the present case I must ask myself the question: "On July 4, 1948, for what purposes did the trustees hold this second £20,000 fund?" The answer must be: "For the charitable purposes set out in cl. 17 of the testator's will, these purposes being abridged until further order of this court to paying or applying the whole or such part, if any, as the trustees should think fit of the income of it for the maintenance of the infirmary." That seems to me to postulate payment of income only for a limited period subject to two contingencies:—(i) the exercise of the trustees' discretion to pay or apply the income for the maintenance of the infirmary, and (ii) the absence of any further order in this action ordering application of the fund itself or the income of it for some other charitable purposes within the scope of cl. 17 of the testator's will. In my judgment, neither of these contingencies can approximate to the remote remainder referred to by the Master of the Rolls in the passage in the judgment of the Court of Appeal which I have read, and it must follow that I must answer the question raised in this petition by declaring that the second £20,000 fund did not vest in the Minister of Health on July 5, 1948, under the provisions of s. 7 (4) of the National Health Service Act, 1946, and, accordingly, should not be transferred to the Minister under that sub-section.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Wilson, Wright & Ascrofts, Preston (for the plaintiffs); Boote, Edgar & Co., Manchester, agents for the Solicitor, Ministry of Health (for the Minister of Health); Buck & Dicksons, Preston (for the Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster).

[Reported by JAMES FITZHUGH, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Applied. CHURCH v. CHURCH.
[1952] 2 All E.R. 441.

RICHARDS v. RICHARDS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.JJ.), May 7, 8, 1952.]

Divorce—Conduct conducing—Desertion by other spouse—Desertion by husband—Adultery of wife.

Divorce—Desertion—Termination—Adultery by deserted spouse—Effect on deserting spouse's mind.

The parties were married in May, 1947. Later in the year the husband, who was then in the army, heard that the wife was going about with other men, and in December, 1947, he left her. In 1949 the wife committed adultery, and asked the husband to take divorce proceedings against her. In December, 1950, he asked her to make a statement to enable him to start proceedings, but, instead of supplying the statement, she presented a petition for divorce against him on the ground of desertion. He presented a cross-petition for divorce on the ground of her adultery.

Held: (i) desertion, by itself, did not conduce to adultery, and there was no conduct on the husband's part conducing to the wife's adultery.

Observation of SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in Herod v. Herod ([1938] 3 All E.R. 729), applied.

(ii) although the wife's adultery did not automatically terminate the husband's desertion, it would be held to be one of the causes of the subsequent desertion unless she could show that the husband's conduct was not affected by it; she had failed to discharge the burden of proof which was on her in that respect; and, therefore, the desertion ended when the husband learned of her adultery, and she was not entitled to a decree of divorce on the ground of his desertion.

Observation of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Williams v. Williams ([1943] 2 All E.R. 748), applied.

(iii) although the court had a discretion, under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 4 (2), proviso (iii), to dismiss the husband's cross-petition as he had deserted the wife before she committed adultery, the discretion should be exercised in his favour and a decree nisi should be granted to him.

AS TO DESERTION, see HALSBURY, 1951 Supp., Divorce, paras. 963-965, and para. 1019; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Supp., Husband and Wife, Nos. 2977b, 2977c, and 2nd Supp., ibid., No. 2912a.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Herod v. Herod, [1938] 3 All E.R. 722; [1939] P. 11; 108 L.J.P. 27; 159 L.T. 530; Digest Supp.
- (2) Callister v. Callister, (1947), 63 T.L.R. 503; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Parry v. Parry, [1896] P. 37; 73 L.T. 759; sub nom. Parry v. Parry Millis v. Millis & Brown, 65 L.J.P. 35; 27 Digest 359, 3433.
- (4) Williams v. Williams, [1943] 2 All E.R. 746; 113 L.J.P. 18; 169 L.T. 375; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Jeffreys v. Jeffreys & Smith, (1864), 3 Sw. & Tr. 493; 33 L.J.P. M. & A. 84; 10 L.T. 309; 164 E.R. 1366; 27 Digest 356, 3404.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of Mr. Commissioner REWCASTLE, K.C., dated Jan. 21, 1952, whereby he granted a decree nisi of divorce to the wife on the ground of the husband's desertion and dismissed a cross-petition by the husband for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery.

On May 31, 1947, the parties were married, while the husband, who was then serving in the army, was on leave, and they lived together for two days. In November, 1947, having heard that the wife was going about with other men, the husband obtained compassionate leave to visit her for a week-end. Although he accepted her explanation at the time, he did not return to her, and, in December, 1947, he wrote a letter to her showing that he then had an intention to leave her. When he was released from the army he saw her once or twice, but they did not live together. In 1949 the wife committed adultery, and, finding that she was pregnant, she informed the husband of the fact, through her solicitors, in October, 1949, and intimated that she would like the husband to begin divorce proceedings against her. He was unable to do so at that time, as three years had not passed since the date of the marriage. In December, 1950, he wrote to the wife's solicitors asking if the wife and the co-respondent would make statements to enable him to commence divorce proceedings, but, instead of supplying the statements, the wife presented a petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's desertion. The husband thereupon put in a cross-prayer for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery.

The learned commissioner found that the husband had deserted the wife from December, 1947, and that the wife's adultery did not terminate the husband's desertion as the husband's conduct had conduced to the adultery.

Seuffert for the husband.

Kee for the wife.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J., stated the facts, and continued: The law in such a situation was stated by SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., in Herod v. Herod (1), in terms which have been repeatedly approved in this court. The wife's adultery does not automatically terminate the desertion. It is, however, a serious prejudice to any hope of reconciliation—so serious, indeed, that it will be held to be one of the causes why there was no reconciliation and, therefore, one of the causes of the subsequent desertion, unless she can show that the husband's conduct was not affected by it. If she can show that he did not know of it, or that he would never have come back to her again in any event, his desertion continues, but, if there is some chance of his coming back and her conduct destroys that chance, his desertion comes to an end when he gets to know of it because he then has good cause for staying away. It is very different if his conduct has conduced to her adultery because, as SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., said ([1938] 3 All E.R. 732):

"I do not think that a spouse could be heard to say that adultery at which he or she had connived, or to which his or her conduct had conduced, was a reasonable excuse for desertion."

That passage was approved and applied in this court in Callister v. Callister (2).

In the present case, therefore, the first question is whether the husband's conduct conduced to the wife's adultery. Conduct only conduces to adultery when it is such conduct "as is proved to have brought about the adultery": see per SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P. (ibid., 729) in Herod v. Herod (1). There must be conduct which is closely and directly connected with the adultery, such as exposing a wife to known and obvious dangers. Applying this test, I am clearly of opinion that desertion by itself is not conduct conducing to adultery. It would be a deplorable thing if desertion by one party were thought to be an excuse for the other party to commit adultery. It may explain the adultery, but it does not excuse it. During the war it often happened that, when the husband was serving abroad, his wife at home committed adultery, and in the pension cases it was always held that the wife's adultery was not caused by the separation, but was due to her own personality and conduct. So, it seems to me, in these cases, when there is desertion and nothing more, and then the wife commits adultery, her adultery is due, not to the desertion, but to her own weakness of character, or, as, no doubt, she would prefer to put it, because she fell in love with another man. That is the case here. A year after the desertion the wife fell in love with another man and committed adultery with him. The adultery is due to her own weakness of character and not to the desertion. In Parry v. Parry (3) there was a separation without any fault on the part of the husband. A jury found that his conduct conduced to the adultery, but GORELL BARNES, J., doubted whether he would have found that there was conduct conducing, and I think that his doubts were well founded. I should have thought there was no evidence in that case of conduct conducing to adultery.

Counsel for the wife contended that in the case now before us there was something more than desertion, but it is significant that in the pleadings it is not alleged that the husband's conduct had conduced to the adultery. That does not prevent the court from considering it, and it may have to do so, but, if the wife does not allege it, it goes to show that there is no substance in that suggestion. The wife was not left destitute. After her husband deserted her, she lived at home with her parents and went out to work to earn her living in the same way as she had done before the marriage. She said in evidence that she did not take proceedings before the justices against her husband for desertion because she did not want money. In those circumstances, it seems to me to be plain that his conduct did not conduce to her adultery. I, therefore, find myself unable to agree with the finding of the commissioner on that point.

Once it is found that the husband's conduct did not conduce to the wife's adultery, it follows that her adultery terminated his desertion unless she can show that it did not. The burden is on the wife to show that her adultery had no effect on the husband's conduct. In the words of LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1943] 2 All E.R. 748) in Williams v. Williams (4), it must be shown that her adultery did not affect the husband's attitude towards her "in the way of impeding a possible reconciliation in future." The commissioner found, in effect, that she had not discharged that burden of proof. He said that the adultery "may have had some effect on his state of mind". The husband gave evidence that it did. He said that, when he found that she was bearing the child of another man, there was no possibility of his going back. On that finding of fact by the commissioner (which is amply supported by the evidence), the wife has failed to prove that her adultery had nothing to do with his subsequent desertion. So the result of the case is this. There was desertion by the husband in December, 1947, the wife committed adultery in the middle of 1949, and, when the husband got to know of it, his desertion ended, because he then had good cause for staying away. She cannot, therefore, succeed on her petition for divorce on the ground of his desertion.

The remaining question is whether the husband should succeed on his cross-petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery. The adultery is established, but, as he deserted her first, that is a ground on which this court has a discretion to refuse his petition: Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 4 (2), proviso (iii). We have been referred to several of the old cases, and among them to Jeffreys v. Jeffreys & Smith (5), decided in 1864. In those days the court refused to grant a decree of divorce to the husband in such circumstances, but discretion is now exercised very differently from what it was in 1864. The wife wants a divorce so that she can marry the other man whose child she has. In the interests of the child—and, indeed, of everyone, since the married life has come to an end—the right course is that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should grant a divorce on the cross-petition of the husband. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed, the wife's prayer should be rejected, and the husband's cross-prayer for divorce should be granted.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Smiles & Co. (for the husband); Edward Fail & Co. (for the wife).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NESTLÉ CO., LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), May 1, 1952.]

Company—Stamp duty—Exemption—Capital duty—Increase of capital to acquire shares in Northern Ireland company—"Existing company"—Finance Act, 1927 (c. 10), s. 55 (1) (b).

The appellant company, incorporated under the laws of Great Britain, increased its capital with a view to the acquisition of not less than ninety per cent. of the issued share capital of a company incorporated under the laws of Northern Ireland. On the question whether the increase of capital was exempt from stamp duty,

HELD: the words "any particular existing company" in s. 55 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1927, referred only to a company regulated by the laws of Great Britain, and, accordingly, the appellant company was not entitled to exemption from stamp duty.

FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1927, s. 55, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 21, p. 935.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Lumsden v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1914] A.C. 877; 84 L.J.K.B. 45; 111 L.T. 993; 42 Digest 623, 238.
- (2) A.-G. v. London Stadiums, Ltd., [1949] 2 All E.R. 1007; [1950] 1 K.B. 387; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Colquhoun v. Heddon, (1890), 25 Q.B.D. 129; 59 L.J.Q.B. 465; 62 L.T. 853; 2 Tax Cas. 621; 42 Digest 687, 1007.

CASE STATED by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to s. 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

The appellant company presented a statement of increase of nominal capital to the commissioners for their opinion as to stamp duty chargeable in respect of that capital. The commissioners were willing to admit that so much of the increase as was referable to the acquisition of shares of certain companies incorporated under the laws of Great Britain was exempt from stamp duty under the provisions of s. 55 (1) (A) of the Finance Act, 1927, but as regards the balance, referable to the acquisition of shares of companies incorporated under the laws of Northern Ireland, they refused exemption.

Grant, Q.C., and Senter for the appellant company.
Pennyquick, Q.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

DANCKWERTS, J.: The question in this case is whether stamp duty is payable by the appellant company, on an increase of its capital, under s. 112 of the Stamp Act, 1891. The immediate point, however, is whether there is an exemption available in the circumstances of the case under s. 55 of the Finance Act, 1927.

The kinds of transactions with which s. 55 is concerned are what are loosely called schemes for the reconstruction of or the amalgamation of companies. In the present case a company formed under the law of Great Britain passed a resolution on Mar. 7, 1951, increasing its capital, which was already £2,300,000, by an addition of £3,410,000, divided into 3,410,000 shares of £1 each. The resolution records that the increased capital was authorised for the purpose of acquiring shares in four companies, Nesmilk, Ltd., Nesfood, Ltd., Nestlé's Food Products (Northern Ireland), Ltd., and Ulster Farm Products, Ltd. Two of those companies were formed and incorporated in England. The last two companies were incorporated under the laws of Northern Ireland—in the one case in the year 1947 and in the other case in 1946. It is the fact of incorporation under the laws of Northern Ireland which produces the controversy in the present case. The matter was somewhat complicated by the rather artificial manner in which the share capital of these companies was held. Paragraph 9 and part of para. 10 of the Case states:

"Immediately before the execution of the agreement referred to in the next paragraph :— (i) Unilac Inc., a company incorporated under the laws of Panama was the registered holder of all the issued shares except one in each of the subsidiary companies, and Food Products Holdings Inc., another company incorporated under the laws of Panama, was the registered holder of the remaining one share in each of the subsidiary companies . . . (10) . . . Under the agreement the consideration was to be satisfied by the issue to Unilac Inc., of 3,410,000 shares of £1 each of the appellant company credited as fully paid."

That was carried out.

The whole question is whether the exemption from duty is applicable only in part in the present case by reason of the fact that two of the companies were formed under the law of Northern Ireland. There is no question as regards that part of the increase of capital which was for the purpose of taking over the shares of the two English companies, because it has been accepted by the commissioners that the exemption applies in so far as the shares of those two companies were taken over. They rejected the claim simply as regards the amount of the increase of capital referable to the taking over of the shares of the two companies formed in Northern Ireland.

That being the position, I turn first to the provisions of s. 112 of the Stamp Act, 1891. That section provides:

"A statement of the amount which is to form the nominal share capital of any company to be registered with limited liability shall be delivered to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies in England, Scotland, or Ireland, and a statement of the amount of any increase of registered capital of any company now registered or to be registered with limited liability shall be delivered to the said Registrar, and every such statement shall be charged with an ad valorem stamp duty of two shillings for every one hundred pounds and any fraction of one hundred pounds over any multiple of one hundred pounds of the amount of such capital or increase of capital as the case may be."

That section is headed: "Charge of duty on capital of limited liability companies," and it is quite plainly concerned with the stamp duty on companies formed under the law of Great Britain. Section 113 deals with another case and is headed: "Charge of duty on capital of companies with limited liability otherwise than under the Companies Acts."

Section 55 of the Finance Act, 1927, deals with certain exemptions which can be obtained on what is called reconstruction or amalgamation. It provides:

"(1) If in connection with a scheme for the reconstruction of any company or companies or the amalgamation of any companies it is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that there exist the following conditions, that is to say—(a) that a company with limited liability is to be registered, or that since the commencement of this Act a company has been incorporated by letters patent or Act of Parliament, or the nominal share capital of a company has been increased; (b) that the company (in this section referred to as 'the transferee company') is to be registered or has been incorporated or has increased its capital with a view to the acquisition either of the undertaking of, or of not less than ninety per cent. of the issued share capital of, any particular existing company."

Pausing there, I may say that the appellant company in the present case is the "transferee company", and that, if all four of the companies whose shares the appellant company is acquiring are companies of a kind that falls within the words "particular existing company", there is no doubt that the conditions of the section are satisfied, because the whole of the share capital of these companies is being acquired. Then:

"(c) that the consideration for the acquisition (except such part thereof as consists in the transfer to or discharge by the transferee company of liabilities of the existing company) consists as to not less than ninety per cent. thereof . . . (ii) where shares are to be acquired, in the issue of shares in the transferee company to the holders of shares in the existing company in exchange for the shares held by them in the existing company; then, subject to the provisions of this section . . ."

Then we find some provisions which are set out under (A) and (B). Taking (A) first, it is provided:

"The nominal share capital of the transferee company, or the amount by which the capital of the transferee company has been increased, as the case may be, shall, for the purpose of computing the stamp duty chargeable in respect of that capital, be treated as being reduced by either—(i) an amount equal to the amount of the share capital of the existing company . . ."

That is the same company as that described in the early part of the section as "any particular existing company." Then, as originally passed, the section continued

". . . in respect of which stamp duty has been paid, or, in the case of the acquisition of a part of an undertaking, equal to such proportion of the said share capital as the value of that part of the undertaking bears to the whole value of the undertaking."

That was the wording of the provision as originally passed, but the words "in respect of which stamp duty has been paid", were eliminated by s. 41 of the Finance Act, 1930, and there were added in a retrospective manner the words "or relief has been allowed under the provisions of this section." Under (B) it is provided,

"Stamp duty under the heading 'Conveyance or transfer on sale' in sched. I to the Stamp Act, 1891, shall not be chargeable on any instrument made for the purposes of or in connection with the transfer of the undertaking or shares nor shall any such duty be chargeable under s. 12 of the Finance Act, 1895, on a copy of any Act of Parliament, or on any instrument vesting, or relating to the vesting of, the undertaking or shares in the transferee company."

Then there are certain provisos. I need only refer to proviso (b) which says:

"in the case of an instrument made for the purposes of or in connection with a transfer to a company within the meaning of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, the provisions of para. (B) of this sub-section shall not apply unless the instrument is either—(i) executed within a period of twelve months from the date of the registration of the transferee company or the date of the resolution for the increase of the nominal share capital of the transferee company, as the case may be; or (ii) made for the purpose of effecting a conveyance or transfer in pursuance of an agreement which has been filed, or particulars of which have been filed, with the registrar of companies within the said period of twelve months."

There is no definition of company in the sub-section, but in sub-s. (8) one finds:

"In this section, unless the context otherwise requires—References to the undertaking of an existing company include references to a part of the undertaking of an existing company: The expression 'shares' includes stock."

The real point at issue is the meaning of that phrase "any particular existing company", and the same phrase repeated in the clause beginning with (A): "the existing company." It is whether it refers to a company formed in any part of the world under the law of any country, or whether it is limited to a company formed under the law of Great Britain. At the time when the Stamp Act was passed, it would be the United Kingdom, but, at the time when the Finance Act, 1927, had been passed, the Government of Ireland, 1920, had come into operation and Northern Ireland had for this purpose been constituted as a separate country.

- A It is said on behalf of the appellant company that the words must bear their natural meaning, and that "company," in its natural meaning, means any company formed anywhere. I have been referred to certain quotations from VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., in Lumsden v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) which are contained in A.-G. v. London Stadiums, Ltd. (2), a decision on this s. 55 of the Finance Act, 1927, though the point with which the Court of Appeal in that case were concerned is not the same as that in the present case. The question in that case was whether, as regards the provisions which are to be found under (B) in the section, a partial transfer of the shares acquired under the scheme of arrangement or amalgamation was sufficient to prevent the benefits of the exemption any longer applying. TUCKER, L.J., quotes from VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C. ([1914] A.C. 892) the following observation ([1949] 2 All E.R. 1011):

- C " . . . it is no doubt true that there are cases of construction where the natural meaning of the words of a statute is rejected, and another meaning not expressed by the words taken in their ordinary sense is read in. That occurs where the context and scheme of the statute requires that this should be done in order that the language of the statute as a whole may be read as consistent. But a mere conjecture that Parliament entertained a purpose which, however natural, has not been embodied in the words it has used if they be literally interpreted is no sufficient reason for departing from the literal interpretation . . . I said at the beginning that the duty of judges in construing statutes is to adhere to the literal construction unless the context renders it plain that such a construction cannot be put on the words. This rule is especially important in cases of statutes which impose taxation."

- D When I examine the judgments of the learned lords justices to ascertain the view which they reached, I come to the conclusion that they did not apply LORD HALDANE's more general statement that the natural meaning should be applied, but put on the words in this part of the section a more limited meaning, so that they came to the conclusion that some other meaning than the strictly literal meaning was required in the particular case.

- E There is another case to which I was referred, Colquhoun v. Heddon (3). The headnote reads:

- G " By the Income Tax Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 54, provision is made for the deduction from assessments under sched. D. of the premium paid by the person assessed for an insurance on his life with any insurance company registered as therein mentioned; and by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 91, s. 1, the benefit of the provision is extended to any person who shall have insured his life 'in or with any insurance company . . . registered pursuant to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110'."

- H It was held by the Court of Appeal that that provision did not apply to an insurance with a foreign company, the New York Assurance Company, even though that company was in existence on Nov. 1, 1844, and had an office in England. FRY, L.J., did not feel as confident in the result as the other two members of the court, and I find some of the reasoning of the majority a little difficult to follow, because what they were concerned with in that case was not the affairs of any foreign company, but whether a British taxpayer should receive exemption or deduction from his taxable liability in respect of a premium which was paid by him and which was paid out of his income, whether it was paid to a company formed in this country or to a company formed somewhere else. FRY, L.J., says (25 Q.B.D. 140):

"It has been strongly pressed upon us that the words 'any insurance company existing on Nov. 1, 1844,' must prima facie mean a company constituted according to the laws of the United Kingdom, and the Master of the Rolls has taken that view. I confess that I am not able to follow him in that conclusion. I think that, in construing an Act of Parliament, we ought to look at the scope and object of the enactment. I have not the least doubt that, if the words, 'any insurance company' were used in an Act which required the registration, or which regulated the constitution, of such companies, or which asserted any right, or proposed to do anything which, according to the comity of nations, could be imposed by a government only upon those who are subject to its legislation, the words would prima facie mean an insurance company constituted according to the laws of the United Kingdom. But we are not now dealing with a case of that kind. The Act is conferring a benefit on persons—Her Majesty's subjects and others—who are liable to the payment of income tax. It creates an exemption in favour of persons who are making provision for their families by means of insurances on their lives. In such a case it does not seem to me very material whether the insurance company is a foreign one or one regulated by the laws of the United Kingdom. The legislature were thinking about the person who makes the payment, and the purpose of the payment, and were not, as it seems to me, at all concerned with the nature and constitution of the company to which the payment was to be made. But, although I am unable to agree with the argument, I nevertheless feel the pressure of the difficulties in the construction of the Act which have been insisted upon for the appellant, because it is anomalous to confer a benefit by reason of a payment made to a foreign company which existed on Nov. 1, 1844, and not to confer the same benefit in the case of a similar payment to a foreign company which came into existence after that date. If I had been left to my own unaided intellect, I should probably have thought the sounder construction was, to take the words in their full and literal meaning, however startling the anomalies which might result from so doing."

But, as the other learned judges reached a different conclusion, he concurred.

Those are the two most relevant authorities on the question which I have to decide, and in them are to be found, no doubt, the principles which I have to apply, but I must confess as regards the issue which I have to determine on the words of this particular section for the present purpose, I am largely left to my unaided intellect.

The first thing which is clear is that the imposition of stamp duty by s. 112 of the Stamp Act, 1891, must be only on companies which are subject to the law of Great Britain and formed under that law, because the comity of nations requires that a government must tax only those people who are under the control of its own laws. Therefore, manifestly the imposition of tax is limited to companies of that kind. Then, when I come to the construction of the relieving s. 55 of the Finance Act, 1927, I find that companies are referred to. Presumably, they are companies which would otherwise have to bear the burden of a particular tax on the increase of their capital. Therefore, I should rather suppose that I was dealing with the same sort of company as that which was being taxed. In the case of a transferee company that condition is satisfied if the company is in fact formed under the law of this country, but when I come to companies which are on the other side of the transaction, so to speak, the matter gives rise to a good deal more difficulty. Taking the words "any particular existing company" and "the existing company", it is true that on the literal meaning of the words the company referred to may be a company of any sort, but I cannot help thinking that, in a relieving statute of this kind, it is not likely that in passing the statute the legislature was concerning itself particularly with a company formed in the Far East or somewhere else abroad. It is much more likely that it was considering transactions in regard to companies existing under the laws of this country. Moreover, it seems to me there are certain indications which compel me to come to that conclusion. Particularly, under

A (A) in sub-s. (1) I find the following provisions:

“The nominal share capital of the transferee company, or the amount by which the capital of the transferee company has been increased, as the case may be, shall, for the purpose of computing the stamp duty chargeable in respect of that capital, be treated as being reduced . . .”

B There is an indication that some stamp duty which has been imposed is to be reduced by something which is covered by these words:

“an amount equal to the amount of the share capital of the existing company in respect of which stamp duty has been paid,” as it originally read.

C It has been said by counsel for the appellant company that, as those words have been repealed, they are no longer relevant. I do not accept that argument. It seems to me that, when you are trying to find out what the meaning of the section is, you have to look at the section as it originally was, to see what words were in it and consider why those words have been removed. It seems to me that, as originally drafted, it is plain the legislature had in mind a company

D the shares of which were being taken over in respect of which stamp duty had already been paid, and the object of the exemption was to prevent stamp duty being levied anew when there was merely an increase of capital for the purpose of the acquisition of existing shares—not strictly a reconstruction or an amalgamation, but very often so referred to under a loose use of those terms. Plainly, in my view, that was the object of the section. When I find that in 1930 those words are repealed,

E am I to conclude that the legislature at that date was desirous of extending this relief in respect of tax on the taking over of shares of a company in any part of the world? I should be a little surprised if that were the intention of the legislature, and I have been supplied by counsel for the commissioners with a reason explaining the purpose of that provision. He says that it was due to the fact that companies had been formed or had increased their capital before the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, introduced the stamp duty in question,

F and, consequently, companies of that kind would not have paid any stamp duty, so it was thought hard that they should be compelled to pay stamp duty on an acquisition of shares merely by reason of the fact that they had not paid a duty that was not exacted at the date when they were formed. That seems to me to be a sensible explanation, and I come to the conclusion that the Act does not refer to companies outside those regulated by the law of this country. It was

G urged on me that this view paid no attention to the provisions contained in the section under the heading (B). It is true that the argument which I have accepted does not depend on, or, indeed, deal with, the provisions which are contained in that part of the section, but I do not think that there is anything in that point. If I come to the conclusion, after considering (A), that the results which have been reached must follow, it does not matter whether or not (B) has been taken into consideration. No doubt, certain consequences will follow under (B), but that does not seem to me to affect the argument which has been based on the provision which one finds in (A). Accordingly, I do not think that affects the view which I have taken.

H There was a further argument which I must mention, based on the provisions of the Government of Ireland Act, 1920. It is put as an alternative argument on the acceptance of the position that the word “company” in s. 55 bears a more limited meaning than “any company”. It is urged, by reason of the provisions of the Government of Ireland Act, 1920, and the Orders in Council which were made under the provisions of that Act, that the provisions of the Companies Acts and the Stamp Acts on the formation of Northern Ireland as a separate entity were carried into and formed part of the law of Northern Ireland, and, therefore, a company operating under those laws is a company which is within the terms of s. 55. It is true that there are to be found in the Act of 1920 and in the Orders in Council made under it provisions which continue for the time being the provisions of the English Companies Acts and Stamp Acts, but, in my opinion, that does not carry the matter through to the point to which it is necessary for the purposes of the argument in question. It seems to me that all these provisions did was to make the current Act of the United Kingdom operative in the new entity of Northern Ireland as part of the domestic law of Northern Ireland. In particular, it seems to me in the present case that the point breaks down, because, in 1932, there was passed in Northern Ireland an Act regulating companies which did away with the effect of the former English Companies Acts in Northern Ireland and established a new Act there. It is under the new Act that the two Northern Ireland companies with which I am concerned were formed. Consequently, it seems to me that this point does not enable exemption to be claimed. Accordingly I reject that argument also.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: McKenna & Co. (for the appellant company); Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Crown).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

MIDGLEY ESTATES, LTD. v. HAND.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Morris, L.JJ.), May 8, 9, 1952.]

Estate Agent—Commission—Agreement to pay commission on purchaser signing legally binding contract—Contract signed, but purchaser unable to complete.

The question in cases in which estate agents claim commission depends on the construction of each particular contract, but, prima facie, the intention of the parties to a transaction of this type is likely to be that the commission stipulated for should only be payable in the event of an actual sale resulting. The vendor puts his property into the hands of an agent for sale, and, generally speaking, he contemplates that, if a completed sale results, and not otherwise, he will be liable for the commission, which he will then pay out of the purchase price. That is, broadly speaking, the intention which, as a matter of probability, the court should be disposed to impute to the parties. It follows that general or ambiguous expressions, purporting, for instance, to make the commission payable in the event of the agent "finding a purchaser", or "selling the property" have been construed as meaning that the commission is only to be payable in the event of an actual and completed sale resulting, or, at least, in the event of the agent succeeding in introducing a purchaser who is able and willing to purchase the property. That is the broad general principle in the light of which the question of construction should be approached, but this does not mean that the contract, if its terms are clear, should not have effect in accordance with those terms even if they do involve the result that the agent's commission is earned and becomes payable although the sale in respect of which it is claimed for some reason or another turns out to be abortive.

On June 23, 1950, the plaintiffs, a firm of estate agents, having been instructed by the defendant to dispose of his property, wrote to him acknowledging his instructions and adding: "The following conditions of sale are taken as agreed on by both parties. Commission at the rate of five per cent. to be paid to the company as soon as our purchaser shall have signed a legally binding contract effected within a period of three months from this date." The defendant accepted these terms and the plaintiffs introduced M. who, on July 6, 1950, signed a binding contract to purchase the property, paid a deposit, and was let into possession. Owing to financial difficulties, M. was unable to complete the purchase with the result that he forfeited his deposit and the defendant regained possession. On a claim by the plaintiffs for commission,

HELD: on construction of the letter of June 23, the plaintiffs, having introduced a person who within the time specified had signed a legally binding contract to purchase the property, were entitled to commission notwithstanding that the sale was never completed.

AS TO REMUNERATION OF AGENT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 1, pp. 257-263, paras. 432-436; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 1, pp. 488-528, Nos. 1664-1861.

Cases referred to:

- (1) Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper, [1941] 1 All E.R. 33; [1941] A.C. 108; 110 L.J.K.B. 131; 164 L.T. 313; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) James v. Smith (1921), [1931] 2 K.B. 317, n; 100 L.J.K.B. 585, n; 145 L.T. 457, n; Digest Supp.
- (3) Poole v. Clarke & Co., [1945] 2 All E.R. 445; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of His Honour JUDGE HAROLD BROWN made at Liverpool County Court on Mar. 6, 1952.

The plaintiffs, who were estate agents, claimed £95 commission on the sale by them of property owned by the defendant. By the terms of the agreement between the parties commission at the rate of five per cent. was to be paid to the plaintiffs "as soon as our purchaser shall have signed a legally binding contract effected within a period of three months from [the date of the agreement]". The plaintiffs introduced a purchaser who signed a binding contract, but was unable to complete. The county court judge held that in view of the purchaser's inability to carry out the contract the plaintiffs had not earned their commission.

A. Rankin for the plaintiffs.

G. Newman for the defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE HAROLD BROWN at Liverpool County Court on Mar. 6, 1952, dismissing the claim of the plaintiffs, who are estate agents, for commission in respect of the sale of a property known as the Railway Supper Bar, Rock Ferry, Cheshire, belonging to the defendant. The learned judge held that on the true construction of the letters constituting the agency contract, read in the light of the numerous authorities bearing on contracts of this kind, the plaintiffs had not earned their commission.

On June 20, 1950, the defendant, Mr. Hand, wrote to the plaintiffs, Midgley Estates, Ltd., in these terms:

"Dear Sirs, I enclose herewith particulars of the above business [the Railway Supper Bar] and should be glad if you would endeavour to dispose of the same on my behalf as soon as possible. I shall be pleased to furnish any further information you may require."

The enclosed particulars gave details of the property and added:

"Price inclusive of property £1,800 with stock, fixtures and fittings at valuation . . . N.B. Fully sixty-six per cent. of the price asked can be arranged on mortgage if so desired."

To that the plaintiffs replied on June 23:

"Dear Sir, re Property known as Railway Supper Bar, 99, Bedford Road, Rock Ferry, Cheshire. We thank you for your written instructions to sell the above property and would confirm that we shall be very pleased to act for you in this respect. The following conditions of sale are taken as agreed on by both parties. Commission at the rate of five per cent. to be paid to the company as soon as our purchaser shall have signed a legally binding contract effected within a period of three months from this date. In the event of the company receiving written instructions from you to withdraw the property from sale or that the property has been sold other than through our agency, we agree to cancel your instructions to sell forthwith and make no charge."

Those terms were accepted by the defendant. The plaintiffs succeeded in introducing a Mr. Mahon, and on July 6, 1950, he signed a binding contract to purchase the property. That contract was superseded by another more formal and elaborate document dated Oct. 2, 1950, and by it Mr. Mahon agreed to purchase the property for £1,900. There is no doubt, therefore, that a person introduced by the plaintiffs did enter into a legally binding contract for the purchase of the property. Mr. Mahon paid £380 deposit and he was let into possession of the property. He was in possession for a considerable time—something like eighteen months, but the sale was never completed, Mr. Mahon not being able to find the whole of the £1,900. In those circumstances the defendant brought proceedings against Mr. Mahon for possession of the property and forfeiture of the deposit. The result of those proceedings was that the deposit was forfeited and the defendant resumed possession of the property. He was thus £380 in pocket. The question then arose whether the plaintiffs were entitled to the amount of the commission stipulated for by their letter of June 23, 1950. The defendant disputing their claim, the plaintiffs sued him in the Liverpool County Court to recover the amount of their commission, namely, £95. That claim was rejected by the learned judge, and from his order the plaintiffs now appeal.

Contracts of agency between owners of property and estate agents have been many times before these courts. We have been referred to a large number of authorities including, in particular, the well-known case in the House of Lords of Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1), and James v. Smith (1921) (2). I hope I will not be thought disrespectful to the careful judgment of the learned judge or to the very full argument which has been presented to us if I refrain from referring to the numerous authorities in detail. As has been pointed out over and over again in the reported cases, an agency contract of this sort, just like any other contract, must be construed according to its terms. One has to look at the contract and see whether, according to its terms, construed in accordance with the ordinary principles of construction, the event has happened in which the commission is expressed to be payable. So far as any general principle is deducible from the authorities, their effect may, I think, be thus summarised. The question depends on the construction of each particular contract, but, prima facie, the intention of the parties to a transaction of this type is likely to be that the commission stipulated for should only be payable in the event of an actual sale resulting. The vendor puts his property into the hands of an agent for sale, and, generally speaking, he contemplates that, if a completed sale results, and not otherwise, he will be liable for the commission, which he will then pay out of the purchase price. That is, broadly speaking, the intention which, as a matter of probability, the court should be disposed to impute to the parties. It follows that general or ambiguous expressions, purporting, for instance, to make the commission payable in the event of the agent "finding a purchaser" or "selling the property" have been construed as meaning that the commission is only to be payable in the event of an actual and completed sale resulting, or, at least, in the event of the agent succeeding in introducing a purchaser who is able and willing to purchase the property. That is the broad general principle in the light of which the question of construction should be approached, but this does not mean that the contract, if its terms are clear, should not have effect in accordance with those terms even if they do involve the result that the agent's commission is earned and becomes payable although the sale in respect of which it is claimed for some reason or another turns out to be abortive.

Returning to the letter in the present case of June 23, it thanks the defendant for his written instructions to sell and then says: "The following conditions of sale are taken as agreed on by both parties", and the vital sentence is this: "Commission at the rate of five per cent. to be paid to the company as soon as our purchaser shall have signed a legally binding contract effected within a period of three months from this date". It seems to me that those words say in reasonably plain terms that the agent's function is to introduce a person who agrees to purchase the property and furthermore binds himself to do so by a legally binding contract. If the agents succeed in producing that result within the stipulated period of three months, the event has happened on the happening of which their commission is to be payable. They have earned the commission and the subsequent fate of the contract of sale does not affect their right to it. That seems to me to be the natural and reasonably clearly expressed meaning of this contract according to the language used. It should, therefore, in my view, be given that effect, and the learned judge, who, as I understand his judgment, was inclined to take a view similar to mine on the construction of the letter of June 23, erred in holding himself bound by authority to take a different view and to conclude that, in view of Mahon's inability to carry out the contract, the commission was not earned.

I have said I did not propose to refer in detail to the authorities, but I should, perhaps, mention Poole v. Clarke & Co. (3), because strong reliance was placed on it by counsel for the defendant. The contract which SINGLETON, J., had to construe in that case was in very peculiar, and, to my mind, ambiguous, terms. It was ([1945] 2 All E.R. 446):

"I hereby instruct you to find a purchaser for my business, the particulars of which are to the best of my knowledge and belief correctly stated as above. I also instruct you to receive any deposit paid by such purchaser and to apply same on the signing of the contract, as far as possible, towards payment of your expenses and commission as agreed hereunder . . . Amount of commission and expenses: (a) Commission of ten per cent. on the total purchase price (minimum twenty-five guineas) and expenses."

Then there was added:

"The vendor agrees to pay any out of pocket expenses up to and not exceeding £10 10s."

Strong reliance was placed by counsel for the agents on the fact that the agents were authorised to receive any deposit paid by the purchaser and to apply the same towards payment of their commission. The argument was to the effect that this provision showed that the commission was to be considered as earned so soon as a contract was signed and a deposit was paid. The learned judge rejected that contention. He held that the commission was not earned until the agents had carried out the vendor's request to them to find a purchaser. Inasmuch as the expression "find a purchaser" had been construed in the authorities as meaning a purchaser able and willing to purchase, the learned judge held that the commission had not been earned, and, consequently, that the provisions for applying the deposit in payment of it could not have the effect contended for. It seems to me that the language of the contract in that case was so very different from the language in the present case that it is of no assistance as regards the contract we have here to construe. The contract here suggests no independent obligation on the agents to "find a purchaser". The payment of the commission is made to depend simply on the signing of a binding contract. The circumstance that the person who is to sign is described by the plaintiffs as "our purchaser" cannot, in my view, affect the result. As already indicated, I think it is reasonably plain that "purchaser" in the context of this letter means no more than a person who agrees to purchase the property and enters into a legally binding contract so to do. For these reasons it seems to me that on the true construction of this particular contract in the events which happened the agents did earn their commission, and, accordingly, in my view this appeal should succeed.

I should add that, as pointed out by counsel for the plaintiffs, this cannot by any means be said to be a case where the owner of property has found himself exposed to a claim for commission on the strength of a contract of sale negotiated by his agents with a mere man of straw. It seems to me on the evidence that, though the contrary ultimately proved to be the case, there was good reason for supposing that Mr. Mahon would, in the event of his entering into a binding contract as he did, be able to carry it through. He paid a deposit of £380 and came near to raising the balance of the purchase money. His inability to do so seems to have been, in part at all events, due to the fact that in the end the defendant was not disposed to advance on mortgage any substantial proportion of the price. I would, therefore, allow this appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered and with the reasons which JENKINS, L.J., has given for the conclusion at which he arrives. I only want to add one observation, and that relates to a paragraph in the learned judge's judgment in which he sets out the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs to this effect:

"In the course of that argument, Mr. Rankin was constrained to put his case as high as this, namely, that even had a man of straw been introduced and had signed a legally binding contract, the plaintiffs would, in the absence of fraud have been entitled to commission."

It is unnecessary to consider whether in addition to fraud some question of negligence might in certain circumstances arise. All I wish to point out is that under a contract of the kind which we are construing the commission is not earned until there is the signing of a legally binding document and there would be ample opportunity, one would think, for the vendor to make such inquiries as he thought necessary to satisfy himself as to the ability of the person who had been introduced to complete the contract which was to be put before him for signature. If the vendor were not satisfied with the result of his inquiries, he would not, of course, be under any obligation to accept the person whom the estate agents had introduced as a possible purchaser.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. The case depends on the construction of the words used in the letter of June 23 as those words are found in their context. In my judgment, by accepting those words, the vendor agreed to pay commission as soon as the purchaser introduced by the agents should have signed a legally binding contract providing that took place within three months from June 23. The agents, therefore, will have earned their commission, and are entitled to be paid it, as soon as a person introduced by the agents enters, in the capacity of a purchaser, into a legally binding contract with the vendor within the time specified. As my Lord has said, it is to be observed that no allegations of bad faith or imputations of negligence are made. In my judgment, the admitted facts show that the commission had been earned.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Cardew-Smith & Ross, agents for Geoffrey Warhurst & Co., Liverpool (for the plaintiffs); Field, Roscoe & Co., agents for Berkson & Berkson, Birkenhead (for the defendant).

[Reported by J. D. PENNINGTON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

GILLETT v. GILLETT AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Denning and Hodson, L.JJ.), May 6, 7, 1952.]

Divorce — Pleading — Petition — Allegation of condoned adultery — Relevancy — Amendment at a late stage.

In January, 1951, a husband presented a petition for divorce on the ground that in 1945 his wife had committed adultery with a named man. In her answer the wife pleaded that that adultery had been condoned. In 1952, after the case had been set down, the husband applied for leave to amend the petition by adding an allegation that the wife had committed adultery with another named man during the years 1944 to 1948 and that that adultery had been condoned.

HELD: a condoned adultery might be relevant to the general issue in the case, or in ancillary proceedings for maintenance or custody, and, therefore, the amendment was relevant.

Per HODSON, L.J.: Whether at a late stage a party might be given leave to amend by adding something which he knew all about before the petition was presented, was essentially a matter in the discretion of the judge with which the Court of Appeal should not interfere.

AS TO AMENDMENT OF PETITION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 695, para. 1035.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the wife from an order of COLLINGWOOD, J., dated Apr. 3, 1952, dismissing the wife's appeal from an order of a registrar allowing an amendment of the petition by alleging a condoned adultery.

Hylton-Foster, Q.C., and H. S. Law for the wife.

Syms for the husband.

SINGLETON, L.J.: In his petition the husband alleged that the wife had committed adultery with a named man in April and May, 1945. In her answer the wife admitted that adultery, but pleaded that the husband had condoned it. The husband now wishes to amend the petition by adding an allegation of adultery with another man, which is said to have extended over a long period of years, and he says that he condoned that adultery. The application for leave to make that amendment was allowed by the registrar, and COLLINGWOOD, J., dismissed an appeal. Counsel for the wife has submitted to this court that the proposed amendment was wholly irrelevant, and ought not to have been allowed.

The husband originally alleged adultery in 1945. The adultery which he now seeks to allege by way of amendment covers the years 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947 and 1948—adultery which, he admits, he condoned. On one view of the case that may be irrelevant; on the other hand, when this petition comes to be heard it may be a part of the history which should be before the judge and some of those matters alleged may become relevant on the issue which has to be tried. I do not think it is possible to say at this stage whether or not the matters dealt with by the proposed amendment will be relevant on the trial. No doubt that is the view which COLLINGWOOD, J., took when he dismissed the appeal from the registrar. In any case, it was a matter for his discretion. I think he was right in dismissing the appeal.

So far as I can see, if the proposed amendment is allowed, it may be necessary for the petition to be served on someone else. That may mean further delay, but not the slightest harm can be done to the wife by the amendment. The husband is not seeking any remedy in respect of the adultery which he seeks to include in the amendment, because he condoned it. I am satisfied that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. If this woman did commit adultery which has been condoned, I am clear that the court ought to be informed about it. No relief is claimed against her or the man in respect of it, because it was condoned; nevertheless, it may well be relevant to the general issues in the case. Furthermore, it may well be relevant in any ancillary proceedings which follow thereafter for maintenance or custody, and, therefore, I think it was right for it to be pleaded. I do not mean to say that in a divorce case the court cannot be told of condoned adultery, or cannot receive evidence of it, unless it is pleaded. That may be a matter for the discretion of the court, but I can understand a court saying on some occasions that it will not receive the evidence unless notice is given to the named man. That being so, it is better that that notice should be given beforehand, as is proposed by this amendment. In my opinion, COLLINGWOOD, J., was right in the course he took.

HODSON, L.J.: The first point taken by the wife was that the husband should not at this late stage, in 1952 (the petition having been presented in 1951), and after the case has been set down, be permitted to amend by adding to his petition something which he knew about before the petition was presented. That seems to me to be essentially a matter which is in the discretion of the judge who allowed the amendment and one on which I think this court should not interfere. To my mind, the only substantial question on this appeal is whether or not the proposed amendment is relevant. I think it is. It is unnecessary to discuss whether it would be more appropriate to include it in the reply rather than in the petition. The issue has been clearly raised by the wife in her answer, namely, that her adultery as alleged in the petition was condoned.

In dealing with the issue of condonation, it seems to me impossible for the court to be shut out from ascertaining exactly what, if anything, was condoned. The husband is bound at some stage to say that what he did condone was not the adultery which the wife says he condoned, but some other adultery, namely, the adultery with the man named in the proposed amendment, and, therefore, that adultery is relevant to be considered on the issue of condonation raised in the pleadings as they stand unamended. Moreover, apart from the pleadings, the court has a duty under s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, to satisfy itself as to the absence of condonation, and that arises whether the suit is defended or not and whether the parties raise the issue or not, so it is impossible on any view of the case to say that this amendment is irrelevant. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Preston, Lane-Claypon & O'Kelly (for the wife); Corsellis & Berney (for the husband).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

END OF VOLUME ONE.

